

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. TENANT FARMERS (IRELAND)—EVICTIONS FROM INABILITY TO PAY RENT—Amendment proposed,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words,—“And humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fear that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1831, causing widespread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are,”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added:”—After long debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,” — (Sir Thomas E. F. E. E. E.) —After further short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

CROFTERS SCOTLAND ACT, 1886—INADEQUACY OF THE ACT—

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words, "And this House humbly expresses its regret that the condition of affairs in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland is very unsatisfactory; that the administration of the Law does not possess the confidence of the people; that the Naval Forces are supposed to be required to overawe a portion of the population; and that the greatest and most pressing grievance of the crofters and cottars has not been remedied by the Crofters Act, which has failed to provide for the enlargement of the present inadequate holdings, and the formation of new holdings, where they are urgently required,"—(Mr. Eslemont)

MOTION.

—o—

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means, and all stages of the Appropriation Bill, have precedence of other Orders of the Day and the Notices of Motions on every day on which they may be appointed,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House the state of Ireland is such as to require the proposal of remedial measures by the Government, before the time of the House is appropriated solely to the Business of Supply,"—(Mr. Dillon)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means, and all stages of the Appropriation Bill, have precedence of other Orders of the Day and the Notices of Motions on every day on which they may be appointed.

Ordered, That the Standing Order, No. 21, relating to Notices on going into Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday be extended to the other days of the week,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

IN

IRELAND.

50^o VICTORIÆ, 1886.

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF*

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIRST VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

THE TWENTY-THIRD PARLIAMENT of the United Kingdom—which had met for the despatch of Business on Tuesday, the 12th day of January, 1886, was prorogued on the 25th day of June to the 15th day of July; and, on the same day, was dissolved by Proclamation:—
And Her Majesty therein declaring Her pleasure to call a new Parliament, directed Writs to be issued accordingly; which Writs were made returnable on Thursday, the 5th day of August.

The PARLIAMENT was opened by Commission.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 5th August, 1886.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS being met.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House.

"That Her Majesty, not thinking fit to be personally present here this day, has been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament."

Then Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS——namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR Lord

VOL. CCCVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Halsbury; The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount Cranbrook); The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan); The SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of Iddlesleigh); and The LORD BRADBOURNE—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Wool-sack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read."

Who being come,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER MAJESTY, not thinking fit to be present here to-day in Her Royal Person, hath been pleased, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament, to cause Letters Patent to be issued under the Great Seal, constituting us and several other Lords therein named Her Commissioners, to do all things in Her Majesty's name, on Her part necessary to be performed in this Parliament, and this will more fully appear by the Letters Patent themselves, which will now be read.

Then the said Letters Patent were read by the Clerk. And then

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"We have it in command from Her Majesty to let you know, that Her Majesty will, as soon as the Members of both Houses shall be sworn, declare the causes of Her calling this Parliament; and it being necessary that a Speaker of the House of Commons shall be first chosen, it is Her Majesty's Pleasure that you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, repair to the Place where you are to sit, and there proceed to the Choice of some proper Person to be your Speaker; and that you present such Person, whom you shall so choose, here, To-morrow, at Twelve o'clock, for Her Majesty's Royal Approbation."

Then the Commons withdrew.

PRAYERS.

The Lord Chancellor—Singly, in the first place, took the Oath at the Table.

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Garter King of Arms attending, delivered at the Table (in the usual manner) a List of the Lords Temporal in the First Session of the Twenty-fourth Parliament of the United Kingdom: The same was ordered to lie on the Table.

Certificate of the Election of Sixteen Representative Peers for Scotland—Delivered, and read, as follows:—

Earl of Mar.

„ Morton.

„ Mar and Kellie.

„ Haddington.

„ Lindsay.

Earl of Airlie.

„ Northeak.

„ Polwarth.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

House adjourned at half past
Two o'clock, till To-morrow,
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 5th August, 1886.

The House met at Two of the clock; and, it being the first day of the meeting of this Parliament, pursuant to Proclamation, Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, Archibald John Scott Milman, and Francis Broxholm Grey Jenkinson, esquires, Clerks Assistant, attending in the House, and the other Clerks attending, according to their duty, Kenneth Augustus Muir Macdonald, esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in Great Britain, delivered to the said Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave a Book, containing a List of the Names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

Several of the Members repaired to their Seats.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners by Black Rod;

The House went;—And a Commission having been read for opening and holding the Parliament, the Lords Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the Election of a Speaker, and present him To-morrow, at Twelve of the clock, in the House of Peers for the Royal Approbation.

And the House being returned;—

ELECTION OF A SPEAKER.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.) (addressing himself to the Clerk, who, standing up, pointed to him, and then sat down)—Mr. Palgrave, in obedience to the gracious communication which we have just received from Her Majesty in "another place," it becomes the first duty of the House of Commons to proceed to the election of Speaker; and I feel it a special honour that I have been requested, on the present occasion, to propose as a candidate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Warwick and Leamington, feeling more than confident that the name of Mr. Arthur Peel will be received with the utmost cordiality and with the unanimous approval of the House. It is hardly necessary for me to refer to the past services of Mr. Peel in the Chair. They are well known to all hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have had the honour of a seat during the last two Parliaments; and I am quite confident that one feeling is uppermost in their minds, and that is one of gratitude to him for the way in which he has fulfilled the arduous duties of the Chair in the past. But I would venture to say to those hon. Gentlemen who are about to take their seats for the first time in the House that they must have realized full well, as the outside public has done already, that Mr. Peel has fulfilled the arduous duties, the responsibilities, and the heavy burdens of the Chair with the greatest possible ability; and, further, that he has, on every occasion, shown the greatest impartiality and justice on all sides. He has, certainly — and the House will agree with me entirely when I say it — he has, certainly, a perfect knowledge of the traditions, the usages, and the forms of the House, and he has exhibited on all occasions the greatest possible self-possession, and the soundest judgment and ready decision. When appealed to upon any question as regards the Orders and Rules of the House, his ruling has met with the unanimous approval of the House; and any hon. Member who has had, from time to time, to seek his advice or assistance upon any occasion, has always received the greatest possible courtesy and kindness at the hands of Mr. Peel. In fact, I think I may say that Mr. Peel has, in the past, exceeded even the most sanguine expectations which were formed of him when he was first elected to the Chair, and I cannot conceive for one moment that the House of Commons can have one moment's hesitation on this occasion as regards the selection of a Speaker, when we have amongst us a tried and honoured right hon. Gentleman, who has proved himself on all occasions not only able but most anxious to uphold the dignity and to protect the time-honoured Privileges of this House. In proposing Mr. Peel as Speaker, I believe I am doing so in strict accordance with former precedents, and also, as I have said before, with the unanimous approval of the House of Commons. It has been said, on a former occasion, by a Prime Minister in this House, that the Speaker of the House of Commons ought to have the purity of an English Judge and the spirit of an English gentleman. These qualities, I most unhesitatingly say, Mr. Peel possesses most undoubtedly in every possible respect. I believe him to be the most eminently qualified Member that we have amongst us to occupy the important capacity of Speaker, and I hope most earnestly that his health and strength may long be spared to enable him to occupy the Chair, and that he may be willing to do so with the approval of the House, in an Assembly that we and the nation are so justly proud of. It is out of no disrespect to the House, or to Mr. Peel, that I do not speak at greater length on this occasion, because the House will feel with me that it would be most difficult to say what one would really wish to say in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman; and I believe I am right in saying that it is his own wish that the proceedings of to-day should be as brief as possible. Therefore, Mr. Palgrave, I have only now to move—"That the Right honourable Arthur Wellesley Peel do take the Chair of this House as Speaker."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian, and Leith): I desire, Mr. Palgrave, to second the nomination which has just been made, and I concur altogether in the sentiments which the hon. Member who preceded me (Sir Edward Birkbeck) has very well expressed. There was a time, Sir, when the chief function of the Speaker was to defend the Privileges of this House against external attack. Dangers of that kind have passed away, and the chief function of the Speaker—one may say almost practically the exclusive function of the Speaker—is to defend the House against itself—that is, to vindicate its authority against any individual Member who may not be sufficiently sensible of his duty. And that function, I am afraid, Sir, in modern times, has become still more arduous and difficult than was the original office of defence against aggression, which, in former times, constituted the chief characteristic of the place that he holds. But, Sir, on this occasion, as the hon. Member has well said, we are not dealing with an untried man, and we are not dealing with new circumstances, inasmuch as though the Parliament be new, yet I believe the disposition of all Members who have sat in former Parliaments, and the disposition of those who are now taking their seats for the first time, is alike unanimously favourable to the high claims of Mr. Peel. We feel, Sir, that he has fully answered the expectations that were formed of him at the time when he was first invited to take the Chair. We require, indeed, much from our Speaker. We require from him knowledge and application. We require that he shall combine the greatest tact with the greatest decision. We require from him a singular degree of readiness and a singular degree of exactness. These things are not always so easily united; but, above all, we ask from him temper and a judicial mind. I cannot help offering one remark of congratulation, both to my right hon. Friend and likewise to the constituency that he represents, with respect to the peculiarity of his position. It appears to me to be a remarkable example of discretion on his own part—which can surprise no one—and likewise of forbearance and of discretion on the part of his constituents, that he should not have been called upon, on the occasion of the recent Election, to enter into the details of the sharpest of all controversies which at present exist among us, but that those whom he represents should have been entirely satisfied with his references to his former conduct, and former declarations at periods removed from the present time. I cannot but feel, Sir, that in that conduct and forbearance of his constituents my right hon. Friend will have a new and special advantage in the discharge of a most difficult part of his functions. We must not conceal from ourselves that the functions of Speaker in this House are rendered much more difficult at a period when, instead of being sharply and simply divided into two political Parties, between themselves making up the whole House, the House at present is rather—for a time it may be, but undoubtedly for the time—broken rather into sections. With respect to one of these sections in particular, it has been its unhappy fortune, from causes I need not dwell upon, to find itself in conflict at most periods with a majority of the House, at some periods almost with the whole of it, and at all periods with a large and important part of it; and to administer justice to a small Party thus situated is, no doubt, an office of extreme difficulty and of extreme responsibility. Nor is it possible to give a stronger proof of the highest confidence in the possession by my right hon. Friend of all the qualities needed for a Speaker—and for a distinguished Speaker—than it is if we can feel, as I, for one, entirely feel, that in doing justice even in a case so peculiar as that, my right hon. Friend is entirely qualified and will succeed in the great task in which he is about to embark. It is quite unnecessary for me to enter further upon this question. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the acknowledgment of his past services—the marked acknowledgment of those services which he is now receiving from the apparently unanimous disposition of the House of Commons again to mark its confidence in him by bestowing upon him the very highest honour in its power. At the same time, it is taking undoubtedly on its own behalf the very best security it is possible for it to take for preserving its dignity, its order, and the efficiency of its work. I beg, Sir, to second the Motion.

The House then unanimously calling Mr. PEEL to the Chair,

Mr. PEEL stood up in his place and said: Mr. Palgrave, I think I shall be best consulting the convenience of the House if, on the present occasion, I address it in the fewest and simplest terms. But I should, first of all, wish to discharge an obligation which I readily own, and most readily pay, to the hon. Baronet the Member for East Norfolk (Sir Edward Birkbeck), and to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) for the terms in which they have spoken of myself, and for the manner in which they have submitted my name to the judgment and arbitrament of the House. I say that I shall use but few words on this occasion. It will not I hope be supposed—I hope it will be an impossible supposition—that if I say but little I shall at all undervalue the honour that is involved in the bestowal of the dignity of that Chair, or that I, in any way, underrate the great responsibilities which attach to that position. No, Sir; my reason for speaking briefly is this—that if it should be the pleasure of the House to elect me to-day to fill that Chair, I shall have been within the short space of seven months twice elected to that dignity, and I shall have been three times within 30 months chosen as Speaker of this House. Not, Sir, that the repetition of that honour in any way blunts my sense of it, or that I feel less deeply grateful to the House and every Member in it for this bestowal of the dignity and this mark of their approval. I have the honour of addressing new Members, as well as those who have sat in previous Parliaments. There are many new Members in this House—not so many as so markedly signalized and characterized the constitution of the last Parliament—but if I may be permitted to address myself for a moment to those new Members, I would say that if, in the course of my occupation of the Office of the Chair, I have gained any experience, such experience as I possess is entirely at their service for the purpose of facilitating their acquaintance with the technical Rules, Forms, and Proceedings of this House. And while I offer to new Members, as to old, what little help I may be able to render them in that way, I, on my part, make an appeal to new Members as well as to old—an appeal which I should only be justified in making to-day on the supposition that it is the pleasure of the House to elect me. The appeal, Sir, is this—that they will maintain, as it is the interest of every man among us to maintain, the dignity and authority of the Chair. It may be necessary, in the course of time, to adapt our technical and written Rules and Proceedings to the changing circumstances of the day. I have nothing to say to what may be the pleasure of the House in that respect; but I appeal to all Members alike to observe, not only the written Rules, which may from time to time be changed, but those conventionalities and usages which are amongst the proudest heritages of the House of Commons. Sir, if we observe those Rules—if we observe the best spirit of those traditions, we shall be obtaining the best guarantee and security for the maintenance of freedom of debate, and we shall be doing what in us lies to promote to the utmost that which tends alike to individual and to collective liberty. Sir, I shall say no more upon this occasion, but humbly place myself entirely at the disposal of the judgment of the House of Commons.

The House then again unanimously calling Mr. PEEL to the Chair, he was taken out of his place by the said Sir EDWARD BIRKBECK and the said Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, and conducted to the Chair.

Then Mr. SPEAKER ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: Standing once again in this place by the favour of the House, I desire to repeat my deep acknowledgments to the House for the honour which they have done me, and to assure them that as long as health and strength are given me I shall endeavour to maintain the Privileges of this House, and study to the utmost to promote its interests.

And then the Mace, which before lay under the Table, was now laid upon the Table. Then—

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. W. L. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) rose, and said:—Sir, in the unavoidable absence of my noble Friend who is to lead this House (Lord Randolph Churchill), and in the absence of many distinguished men who sit on this side of the House, and owing to the accident of circumstances which I need not explain, the great honour has fallen upon me to tender to you, Sir, in the name of the Members of this House, our most hearty congratulations on your re-appointment to that Chair. Sir, you have to-day been appointed to the highest Office which it is in the power of this House to bestow. You have been appointed by the unanimous voice of the House. You have been appointed for the third time to that position which you now occupy. On the occasion of your first appointment, a most favourable estimate was made of the manner in which you would discharge the duties of your important and responsible position; and those who have had the privilege of sitting in the last and the preceding Parliaments have been told by experience that the estimate which was then formed has since been fully and completely fulfilled. Sir, you were appointed at a time when the work was most arduous, and sometimes exceedingly difficult. You were appointed in the place of one who had filled with distinguished ability that Chair for many years—one of whom I may say that he had won, in a remarkable degree, the confidence and affection of every Member of this House. Sir, the position which you occupy must always be a difficult one. It is rendered none the less difficult, may I say, with all respect to those who now fill the position, by the loss of one—the late Lord Farnborough—who sat at this Table for so many years, and who possessed in a singular and remarkable degree information and knowledge as to the Forms of the House, which were always at the disposal not only of the Members of the House, but of the Speaker for the time being. Sir, the position which you fill can only be filled satisfactorily, if it is filled by one possessing the confidence of the Members of this House, and by one who is assured of the support of the Members of this House. Sir, your unanimous re-appointment to that position is sufficient proof of the confidence of the Members; and I will venture on their behalf to say that in the position which you now occupy you will have the full and complete and cordial support of every Member of this House. To you, Sir, is entrusted the guardianship of the undoubted Rights and Privileges of every Member of the House. It is because we believe that you will maintain with dignity those Rights and Privileges, and it is because of our confidence in your strict impartiality, judgment, and decision, that we have the greatest satisfaction in your re-appointment. Although the honour which has fallen upon me is one I extremely value, and although I am conscious of the imperfect and inadequate expression which I have given to the voice of the Members of this House, I none the less sincerely and most earnestly, in their name and on their behalf, tender to you our hearty and warmest congratulations.

Mr. W. L. Jackson

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS) (Kent, St. Augustine's): I beg to move that this House do now adjourn, and in making that Motion I wish to state that the House will meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock for the approbation of Mr. Speaker Elect, and for the swearing in of Members; and it is proposed that at 4 o'clock a second Message should come down from the other House authorizing the issue of new Writs. That Message will be drafted in such a way that the new Writs can be moved at once.

MR. SPEAKER ELECT put the Question, which, being agreed to,—

The House was adjourned accordingly, and MR. SPEAKER ELECT went away with the Mace before him.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 6th August, 1886.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

The Lords Commissioners—namely, THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury); THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount Cranbrook); THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan); THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of Iddeleigh); and THE LORD BRABOURNE—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House."

And the Commons being at the Bar:—

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRESENTED AND APPROVED.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL, Speaker Elect, said—

"MY LORDS,

"I have to acquaint your Lordships, that Her Majesty's most faithful Commons, in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, and in the exercise of their undoubted rights and privileges, have proceeded to the Election of a Speaker, and that their choice has fallen upon myself, and I now present myself at your Lordships' Bar, and submit myself with all humility for Her Majesty's gracious approbation."

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"MR. PERL,

"We are commanded to assure you that Her Majesty is so fully sensible of your zeal for the public service, and of your ample sufficiency to execute the rights and duties which Her Majesty's faithful Commons have selected you to discharge, that She does most readily approve and confirm you as their Speaker."

Then MR. SPEAKER said—

"MY LORDS,

"I submit myself with all humility to Her Majesty's gracious commands. It is now my duty, in the name and on behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, to lay claim by humble Petition to Her Majesty, to all their undoubted rights and privileges; especially to freedom of speech in debate; to freedom from arrest of their persons and servants; and, above all, to freedom of access to Her Majesty whenever occasion shall require. For myself, if any error should be committed, I pray it may be imputed to me alone, and not to Her Majesty's faithful Commons."

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR said,

"MR. SPEAKER,

"We have it further in command to inform you that Her Majesty does most readily confirm all the rights and privileges which have ever been granted to or conferred upon the Commons by any of Her Royal Predecessors."

"With respect to yourself, Sir, though Her Majesty is sensible that you stand in no need of such assurance, Her Majesty will ever put the most favourable construction upon your words and actions."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

SAT FIRST.

The Viscount Melville, after the death of his uncle.

The Lord Penrhyn, after the death of his father.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

NEW WRITS.

The Lords Commissioners—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury); The LORD COLERIDGE; The MARQUESS OF HUNTLY; The VISCOUNT BARRINGTON; and The LORD SUDELEY;—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolpack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House."

And the Commons being at the Bar:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"We have it further in command from Her Majesty to acquaint you that, since the time when Her Majesty deemed it right to call you together, for the consideration of many grave and important matters, several vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons, owing to the acceptance of Office from the Crown by Members of that House, or from other causes. It is therefore Her Majesty's pleasure that an opportunity may now be given to issue Writs for supplying the vacancies so occasioned, and that, after a suitable Recess, you may proceed to the consideration of such matters as will then be laid before you."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Thursday the 19th instant, 1/2 past 4 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 6th August, 1886.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

The House being met, and Mr. SPEAKER ELECT having taken the Chair, a Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

"MR. SPEAKER,

"The Lords, authorized by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, desire the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the House of Peers."

Accordingly, Mr. SPEAKER ELECT, with the House, went up to the House of Peers, where he was presented to the said Lords Commissioners for the Royal Approbation.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR, one of the said Lords Commissioners, signified Her Majesty's approbation of Mr. Speaker Elect.

And the House being returned ;—

Mr. SPEAKER (standing in his usual place) said: I have to report to the House that, in the House of Peers, Her Majesty, by Her Royal Commissioners, has been pleased to approve the choice made of myself to the Office of your Speaker, and that I have, in your name and on your behalf, laid claim by humble Petition to Her Majesty to all your ancient and undoubted Rights and Privileges—freedom of speech in debate, freedom from arrest of your persons and servants, and, particularly, of free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion may require, and that the most favourable construction may be placed upon all your proceedings. All these, Her Majesty, by Her Commissioners, has been pleased to grant and confirm, in as ample a manner as they have ever been granted and confirmed by Her Majesty, or by any of Her Royal Predecessors.

My duty now is again to repeat my deep acknowledgments to the House for the honour conferred upon me in again placing me in this Chair. I wish to repeat my acknowledgments to the House, and again to express my sense of the obligations they have imposed upon me. It only remains for me now to invite hon.

Members to come to the Table to take the Oath of Allegiance, and subscribe the Roll in the usual form; and in doing this I may be permitted to call the attention of hon. Members to a Paper which has been issued containing instructions (with the purpose of facilitating the Business). If hon. Members will kindly follow them and consent to the arrangement, I am sure it will facilitate the despatch of Business to-day and on following days.

Mr. SPEAKER then took and subscribed the Oath, first alone; and after him several other Members took and subscribed the Oath, and several other Members made and subscribed the Affirmation required by Law.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported, That the Lords Commissioners under the Great Seal for opening and holding this Parliament, had made a Communication to both Houses, which Mr. Speaker read to the House, as follows:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,

We have it further in command from Her Majesty to acquaint you that, since the time when Her Majesty deemed it right to call you together, for the consideration of many grave and important matters, several vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons owing to the acceptance of Office from the Crown by Members of that House.

It is therefore Her Majesty's pleasure that an opportunity may now be given to issue Writs for supplying the vacancies so occasioned, and that, after a suitable Recess, you may proceed to the consideration of such matters as will then be laid before you.

ELECTIONS.

Ordered, That all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it shall appear that there is no question upon the Return for that place; and if any thing shall come in question touching the Return or Election of any Member,

he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate; and that all Members returned upon double Returns do withdraw till their Returns are determined.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The Commons being at the Bar, with their Speaker, the Lord Chancellor delivered Her Majesty's Speech to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

" I HAVE summoned you to meet at this unusual season of the year for the transaction of indispensable business.

" The Session of the last Parliament was interrupted before the ordinary work of the year had been completed, in order that the sense of my people might be taken on certain important proposals with regard to the government of Ireland. The result of that appeal has been to confirm the conclusion to which the late Parliament had come.

"The provisional nature of the arrangement which was made by the last Parliament for the public charge of the year renders it inexpedient to postpone any further the consideration of the necessary financial legislation.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates which were submitted to the last Parliament, and were only partially voted, will be laid before you.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"At a period of the year usually assigned for the recess, and after the prolonged and exceptional labours to which many of you have been subjected, I abstain from recommending now, for your consideration, any measures except those which are essential to the conduct of the public service during the remaining portion of the financial year. I am confident that they will receive your prompt and careful attention.

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR SCOTLAND.

The LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had received (by post) from the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland, Minutes of the meeting held on the 20th of July last of the Peers of Scotland for the election of their representatives to sit and vote in the ensuing Parliament of the United Kingdom; and also, Return by the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland concerning Titles of Peerages called at the said meeting, in right of which respectively no vote had been received and counted for fifty years last past as at the date of the said meeting: The same were ordered to lie on the Table.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

NEW PEERS.

The Right Honourable William John Lord Monson having been created Viscount Oxenbridge of Burton in the county of Lincoln—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Sir Michael Arthur Bass, Baronet, having been created Baron Burton of Rangemore and of Burton-upon-Trent, both in the county of Stafford—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Bill, pro forma, read 1st.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I wish to ask the noble Marquess opposite (the Prime Minister), seeing that there is no doubt whatever that the Address will be carried by your Lordships this evening, what the Government proposes to do with regard to the future Business of this House?

THE PRIME MINISTER (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My impression is that there will be no Business coming up from the House of Commons within the next 10 days. I do not think, therefore, that any useful purpose will be served by forcing noble Lords to come here when there is no Business to transact; and I should, unless the noble Earl objects, propose to move that the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday week.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW (LORD IN WAITING) (who wore the uniform of a Deputy Lord Lieutenant): In rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in response to the gracious Speech from the Throne I feel that I stand in a position of unusual difficulty. There are two reasons for that. In the first place, I am unable to claim from your Lordships that measure of indulgence which has invariably been accorded by you to young Members of the House who have risen to address it for the first time. I recollect also how, not more than six years ago, your Lordships were kind enough to extend to me similar kindness. And, in the second place, I crave indulgence because the Address I have to move is founded upon a text of unusual shortness and brevity. It is said that "Happy is the country that has no history, and the nation whose annals are dull;" and if that is true of a country, it may well be believed to be true of a Queen's Speech which contains no reference to foreign relations, because it proves how satisfactory are its relations with Foreign Powers, and that, at least, there is no subject engrossing the attention of the Government in regard to foreign affairs which is of such importance as to necessitate the calling of the special attention of Parliament to it. I venture to think that that is in some measure due to the very able and successful conduct of foreign affairs, during the tenure of Office of the late Government, by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Rosebery), who represented that Department. I think it is no disparagement to the noble Earl to say that he has followed successfully the principles laid down by his Predecessor, who now, in his turn, has formed an Administration of his own, to succeed that of which the noble Earl was a shining ornament. The highest praise, I think, that can be accorded to the noble Earl is to say that, by adopting those principles, he has given a unity and consistency to our foreign policy which has raised this country in the estimation of the diplomatists of the world, and which, owing to the peculiarity of Party Government in this country, has unfortunately, of late years, been too seldom found to exist.

Now, it cannot have escaped the observation of your Lordships, in reading the Queen's Gracious Speech from the Throne, that there is a singular and significant absence of any reference to the future policy of the Government towards Ireland; but I cannot believe that there is any Member of your Lordships' House who will think that that omission is in consequence of any want of feeling on the part of Her Majesty's Government as to the due importance which attaches to the very unfortunate state of affairs existing in that Island. The Speech shows, in my opinion, that Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the dangers and difficulties of the present situation in Ireland. The appeal which was recently made to the country placed before the people of England a scheme which has already been before Parliament; and the voice of the country has pronounced, in no uncertain tone, against the scheme of the late Government with reference to the future government of Ireland. It therefore rests with Her Majesty's present Government to propound some alternative which will be agreeable to the newly-elected Parliament. I believe one reason why there is no mention of this and many other important matters in the Queen's Speech is because Her Majesty's Government are anxious to wind up the affairs of the Session with as much expedition and as little controversy as possible. I will shortly call attention to what have been the duties of Parliament and of Members of Parliament during the last two years. In 1884 the Parliament met on the 7th of February, and it sat till the 14th of August in that year. It adjourned until the 23rd of October, when it met again and sat till the 6th of December. It met again on the 19th of February, 1885, and sat until the 14th of August in that year. Then supervened the General Election of 1885, which kept Members of the other House of Parliament before their constituencies, and unable to enjoy their well-earned leisure, during the whole of the latter months of 1885. On the 12th of January, 1886, the new Parliament met, and sat until the Dissolution in June last, after which supervened again the work and the worry of another General Election. I think that, seeing how the country has been kept in a ferment of political excitement, it is not too much to expect that the great majority of its Members must be anxious to be released from their duties. Another reason why it is highly desirable that the Session should be wound up with the greatest expedition is because Her Majesty's Government have fallen on a task of no ordinary magnitude—namely, to frame and propound a policy for the future government of Ireland.

The Earl of Onslow

I venture to think that it is of the last importance that Ministers should not be distracted by those questions and influences which are inseparable from their career during the Session of Parliament. It may be said that noble Lords who sit on the Treasury Bench have so recently occupied the places of Ministers of the Crown that they ought to be able to formulate a policy for the government of Ireland immediately, and at once. To those I would point out what is the political situation now, and what it was then. Then they were faced by a hostile majority in Parliament, composed of the unbroken and undivided ranks of the Liberal Party, and also of those who represented the Nationalists of Ireland. The late Government, on the other hand, depended for its existence upon the support of Mr. Parnell and his followers. Now that has been greatly changed. Her Majesty's Government no longer depend upon Members of the late Administration, nor do they depend upon the goodwill of Mr. Parnell; but they do look for support to a number of noble Lords opposite, and of Gentlemen in the other House of Parliament and throughout the country, representing—I think I shall not be exaggerating when I say the flower of the Liberal Party—those who are called the Liberal Unionists, and who, rather than look back to the records of the past for their political reputation, are anxious to look forward to what should be the record of the future for maintaining that honesty and uprightness which have always been the leading characteristics of our Legislators. That being so, I think I shall not be out of place in asking those Members of your Lordships' House who sit on the other side, and who are Liberal Unionists, to give their support to the Government and to me in moving the adoption of the Address, in order that Her Majesty's Government may have ample time and opportunity, during the coming months, to consider the legislation which they should adopt towards Ireland, and so to support the Government in doing that which they believe to be best for that country, as well as for the general well-being of the United Kingdom. My Lords, I beg to move this humble Address in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to your Majesty for the gracious Speech which your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has summoned us to meet at this unusual season of the year for the transaction of indispensable business.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Session of the last Parliament was interrupted before the ordinary work of the year had been completed, in order that the sense of Your Majesty's people might be taken on certain important proposals with regard to the government of Ireland; and that the result of that appeal has been to confirm the conclusion to which the late Parliament had come.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the provisional nature of the arrangement which was made by the last Parliament for the public charge of the year renders it inexpedient to postpone any further the consideration of the necessary financial legislation.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that at a period of the year usually assigned for the recess, and after the prolonged and exceptional labours to which many of us have been subjected, Your Majesty abstains from recommending now, for our consideration, any measures except those which are essential to the conduct of the public service during the remaining portion of the financial year.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that such measures shall receive our prompt and careful attention."

LORD DE ROS (LORD IN WAITING) (who was attired in the Lévee dress of a Lord of the Bedchamber), in rising to second the Motion, said: Although the noble Earl has left me very little to say, I feel I should be wanting in courtesy to the House if I did not, in a very few words, allude to what has been justly called the burning subject of the day—namely, the present condition of Ireland. Ever since the Land Act of 1881, which, by the way, was supposed to be a panacea for everything that was evil in Ireland, that country has been in the most unsettled condition; and that Act has satisfied no one, but, on the contrary, has had the effect of straining the relations between landlord and tenant to the utmost point. It has also given rise to the formation of one of the most formidable organizations which has been known in modern days—I mean the Land League, which, being gradually merged into the National League, received, to so great a degree, the powerful support of the late Prime Minister and the late Government when in Office. Happily, the verdict of this country, at the last General Election, pronounced most decidedly against its pernicious doctrines, and more particularly against that doctrine which advocated the disruption of the Empire. I feel certain, therefore, that the announcement made a short time ago by a prominent Member of the present Ministry that it was their determination to administer the present ordinary law with firmness and decision, and, if that action should not prove sufficient, to resort to such extraordinary measures as they might consider advisable for the maintenance of peace and order in Ireland—I feel sure those sentiments will be received with the greatest satisfaction by all law-abiding persons in Ireland.

I cannot pass over the unfortunate circumstances which have taken place lately in Belfast. Being a resident in that part of the country, naturally that is one of the subjects most prominent in my mind. It has illustrated beyond anything the very strong Party feeling which exists in that part of the country. As I understand that a judicial investigation is about to take place upon the subject in general, it would be improper in me to pronounce my opinion as to the original cause of those riots. But I may say that I am clearly of opinion—and I know it is the general opinion of the magistrates and gentry in my neighbourhood—that one of the main causes of those unfortunate outbreaks was the permission of Party processions with bands and flags and banners. It is well known that the beat of a drum excites the Irishman to such a degree that he loses all control over his actions. I think it very unfortunate that a large force of Irish Constabulary was, under the late Government, drafted into Belfast from the country; and I believe the conduct of some of those men is open to severe criticism, and I sincerely trust that an investigation on oath will be taken upon their conduct, as well as upon the general subject of the riots. The first act of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland was to summon the Mayor of Belfast to Dublin, in order to obtain his views as to the best means of suppressing the riots; and I cannot help thinking that, if that had been done in the first instance, a very great deal of bloodshed might have been stopped. In conclusion, I may say that every topic in the Queen's Speech has been exhausted by the noble Earl who moved the Address, and it only remains for me to reiterate the hope with which the noble Earl concluded his speech. I beg to second the Motion that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty.—[See page 26.]

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have some doubt as to whether, considering the unusual circumstances of our meeting, it is desirable that I should adhere to the custom of rising after the Mover and Seconder of the Address; but, although I certainly do not intend to trouble your Lordships at any length, I shall endeavour to make a speech, following the example of brevity which Her Majesty has been advised to adopt. I think that if I speak now, it may, as I desire, give the noble Marquess the Prime Minister the advantage of the best opportunity for making that statement which I have no doubt he is desirous to make to your Lordships and to Parliament generally. My Lords, I have said there are unusual circumstances connected with our meeting. In the first place, there is no doubt that there have seldom been such rapid changes of Administration as have lately taken place. In reading some remarks which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack (Lord Halsbury) made to certain dames of the Primrose League with regard to the great disadvantages of rapid changes of Government, it just struck me that those remarks might have had still more weight if the noble and learned Lord had made them a month before the change of Government took place, and he came into Office, instead of a month after. But I very much agree with the noble and learned Lord. I have no doubt that, under representative institutions, it is most desirable that there should be occasional changes of Government, and that each great Party in the State should have an opportunity of acquiring official experience, and of obtaining the sense of official responsibility. There is no doubt that if these changes take place too quickly it is a disadvantage, and I am afraid it is one of these things which individuals cannot control, but of which it may be said—"Man may propose, but God alone can dispose." There is another unusual thing, and this is with regard to the time of our meeting; and I only wish, upon this subject, to point out that the promise to meet as early as this was absolutely conditional, and was only done to dispel any unworthy suspicion that we wished to cling to Office after the decision of the constituencies had declared against us. It was perfectly open to Her Majesty's Government to have taken more time, if they thought it necessary, for the consideration of measures, and to call Parliament together before the winter began, and in time to meet all the financial requirements of the nation. Well, I think I need not point out how singularly meagre the Queen's Speech and the Address in answer to it are; that has been very well done for me by the two noble Lords who have spoken; and now I may say one word with regard to the noble Earl who moved and the noble and gallant Lord who seconded the Address. It has been very often my fate of late years to have the privilege—with few exceptions, and with perfect sincerity—to compliment the noble Lords who have moved and seconded the Address, particularly when those noble Lords were young Peers, and were about thus to make their first essay in coming before the notice of your Lordships. Now, it would be unbecoming for me to compliment two respected and popular Members of this House, whom I have often listened to with interest and pleasure, with regard to the manner in which they have performed their task; but I cannot conceal my admiration at the skill with which they have imitated, and I may say have far surpassed, the ancient Egyptians in being able to make bricks without the trace of a straw. The want of material for a speech has created a difficulty. We all know the large number of independent supporters who follow the noble Marquess opposite; and I suppose that fact made it impossible for him to persuade any one of them to move or second this particular Address, and obliged him to impose a duty in a very novel manner upon two salaried Members of the Government. The noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) was obliged, in order to make a speech, to go outside the records of the Queen's Speech, and so much so, that I can hardly follow him in all the remarks he has made. The subjects of India and the Colonies, however, have occupied, and require, public attention very much of late; yet there is not one word about them in the Queen's Speech. With regard to India, there are some very important questions. I only hope, in alluding to these, to induce the noble Marquess to give us some information on the subject. I mean with regard to the state of Burmah. The annexation of Burmah was inaugurated by the late Government of the noble Marquess. We took over the policy as we found it; but there are reports which I should mention, in the hope that he will be able to minimize them, tending to support the argument which the noble Marquess near me raised against the expedition to Burmah, and the statements which I myself made, that the noble Marquess's late Administration rather underrated the difficulties of their task. With regard to the Colonies, I read a speech the other day by the noble Marquess on the question of Imperial federation; and, if he will allow me to say so, I was very much struck with the justice and good sense of that speech, and the appreciation he seemed so justly to have formed, on the one hand, of the feelings and sentiments of the Colonists in regard to the matter; and, on the other hand, of their practical opinions on the subject. With regard to foreign affairs, the noble Earl who moved the Address said the omission of any reference to foreign affairs showed that there is nothing occurring at this moment of a critical nature. I trust the noble Marquess will be able to confirm that statement. The noble Marquess did make a speech at the Mansion House the other day, in which he touched with a light hand upon the immortality of the Afghan and Egyptian Questions, although I may point out that more than a year ago we were severely censured for not having solved them. On these matters I trust he will have some reassuring information to give us to-night.

My Lords, there is one question referred to by the noble Earl which is excluded from the Speech, or, rather, which is alluded to in so faint a manner as to be practically excluded. I mean the question of Ireland; and I cannot help thinking that, in asking the noble Marquess, who is likely to follow me, to give us a general—without detail—and clear indication of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, I am not doing anything but giving expression to the desire of both sides of the House. I remember Lord Lansdowne, who was so long and well known as the Leader of this House, saying that a noble Earl from the Sister Island, when sitting in Committee by him, used, after putting a question, the remark that he put the question because he knew the answer. I am bound to say I am not in the position of that noble Earl. I have no idea of the answer, or of what is the policy of the present Government in regard to Ireland. In order, in some degree, to enlighten my ignorance on this point I have been studying the utterances made by some of the most important Members of the Government during the last year and a-half, and I will venture to quote some of these declarations. In 1885 the noble Marquess, in his Ministerial Statement, said he would avoid any reference to Ireland, and would trust to the noble Earl, who was then the Viceroy, to explain the policy of the Government. The noble Earl whom I see opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) obeyed that mandate, and, following a very illustrious example, said there were three courses open to the Government. One was to re-enact the whole of the Crimes Act; the other to re-enact a portion of it; and the third was to let it lapse. But he objected to the first two courses, because he objected to exceptional legislation; and because, as he remarked, exceptional legislation had been almost continuously applied to Ireland. The statement which he thus made was of a negative character, still the tone of it was such as to please Mr. Parnell and his supporters. It led to communications between those Gentlemen and the Viceroy, in the course of which that conversation which has become famous occurred, and it led to some effectual results in the ensuing Elections. I will not quote from the speeches delivered during the autumn by some leading Members of the Government. On the eve of the meeting of Parliament the Viceroy resigned. We are told that he was in perfect accord with the Government, and that his resignation was only a preconcerted arrangement six months old. The Chief Secretary in the other House also resigned; and it is a matter of some observation that neither of those two public men have joined the present Government. The Queen's Speech, you will remember, my Lords, contained a very vague declaration as to what the policy of the Government was to be. Mr. Smith was appointed Chief Secretary, and was sent to Dublin to report. We were warned by the noble Marquess that that would take a long time; but Mr. Smith was better than his word; and we all know what happened and what were the results. A new Government came into Office, and Mr. Gladstone introduced two measures within a very few weeks of the formation of his Government. They led to a very warm and able discussion on which I need not dwell, and speeches were made both in Parliament and out of Parliament on the subject during the recent Elections, with respect to the intentions of the Government. I do not wish to argue now on the merits or demerits of these measures; but I think I can safely say that they constituted a policy at once wise and expedient, and that I believe the postponement of them was a great national misfortune. But I think we can safely assert that, whether the policy was good or bad, it was a very clear and very well-defined policy, and one which anyone who had chosen could understand. During the Elections various speeches were made, and among them the noble Marquess made a declaration which attracted great attention, which was to the effect that, in his opinion, if there were 20 years during which Parliament enabled the Government to govern Ireland resolutely, then, at the end of those 20 years, it would be possible to repeal that exceptional legislation, and give some sort of self-government to Ireland. That declaration appeared to me to be a very clear one; but on three subsequent occasions the noble Marquess had completely denied the meaning which some of us had thought seemed necessarily to flow from his words, and said that he had been misunderstood. The noble Marquess had an opportunity of making another declaration only last week, and he declared that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was to maintain social order in Ireland. But the question naturally arose, "how" and "when"? As to the question of "how," the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Henry Matthews), has enlightened his constituents. He said the policy of the Government was to defy Mr. Parnell. Now, I admit that it may be easy, and that it is a legitimate policy, to defy Mr. Parnell when he is wrong; but when it comes to defying the great majority of Members who represent the great majority of the Irish people, that is hardly a sufficient basis for a permanent policy of government in regard to Ireland. I am perfectly certain, for instance, that such a policy would not meet the case of Belfast at the present moment. I must say I regret that the noble and gallant Lord who seconded the Address (Lord de Ros), with his knowledge of Ireland, should have taken the opportunity to condemn at once the action of the police—the Queen's police—at Belfast.

LORD DE ROS: The observation that I made with regard to the Constabulary in Ireland was that it was a case that required investigation. I am not quite sure that I did not use the words "criticism" and "investigation."

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Lord said more than that. He spoke of the conduct of the police who came from the country districts. I have now mentioned some facts as an explanation of my ignorance as to the policy of the Government, and I am sure the ignorance of hundreds of thousands, both in this country and Ireland, and it surely cannot be desirable that we should wait six months before receiving some explanation of the Irish policy of the Government. The noble Marquess may complain that we are asking for premature information; but I repeat that I do not ask for any statement of a detailed character, but only a statement of a clear and general character as to the views of Her Majesty's Government. I dare say the noble Marquess may find a precedent for a Minister asking for six months in order to elaborate his policy with regard to Ireland; but I am perfectly sure that he will not find a precedent where those measures are not merely measures of ordinary legislation, but those deeply affecting social order in Ireland. Are the Government to remain absolutely without any action and perfectly silent during this period of six months, in the same way as they did a year ago, which led to deplorable results to Ireland? The noble Marquess may complain of my questions being premature; but what was the language of the noble Marquess and his Colleagues last year? When the Government was formed, Mr. Gladstone promised, in six weeks, not to make a statement merely, but to bring in a perfected Bill on the subject. The noble Marquess received this announcement with perfect indignation, and said it was treating Parliament with levity, and that it was not only treating Parliament badly, but playing with a question of life and death to Ireland—that of social order. A little later in the year, when we had produced plans which we had hoped, if carried, would have dealt successfully with the question of social order, and when a Bill—the Arms Bill—was introduced of a precautionary character, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland got up and said a certain noble Lord was perfectly justified in insisting on the Government giving more information. What did the present Lord President of the Council (Viscount Cranbrook) do? He said—"The question is one of the moment—you are neglecting the moment." I should like to ask the noble Viscount whether there is anything of the moment at the present time? Reference has been made to the strained relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland. If there is anything more distasteful than another to us, who supported the policy of the late Government, it is anything in the nature of agrarian outrage, "Boycotting," or the wilful non-payment of rent. Anything that we can do to discourage such acts we shall do to the utmost; but I do not think the noble Marquess can say that the relations between landlord and tenant are not strained at this time. Is it safe to assume that, contrary to the experience of the last year, you are safe in taking six months—not six weeks—to consider your policy, with the view of meeting questions involving the maintenance of social order? I do venture to hope that that is hardly the view taken by the noble Marquess, and I earnestly appeal to him to make some clear declaration in answer to the question I have put to him, and not to allow it to be said that he is treating Parliament with levity, and the Sister Kingdom with fatal injustice, with regard to the vital question of social order in Ireland.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My noble Friend who has just sat down (Earl Granville) has said, in his gentlest and softest tones, quite enough to break through the languor of the season; and the quiet prudence with which his speech has been commended to the House has indicated the tone which, from the point of view of the late Government, this question is to be presented to the House. I do not regret that my noble Friend has alluded to past transactions, and has made a demand upon the present Prime Minister which I maintain the last Prime Minister is of all people in the world the least entitled to make. I should not have risen at present to interfere in this debate after the change of Government if I did not feel, as we all must feel, that we are not at the end, but at the beginning of a great political crisis. So far as my own opinions and action are concerned, and those of other noble Lords, especially my noble and learned Friend near me (the Earl of Selborne), I have done what I could, both by pen and tongue, to oppose the Irish measures of the late Government in company with many others of much greater authority and ability, and of greater persuasive powers than I possess; and I desire to avow in this House the delight with which I saw their measures defeated, and the change of Government which has taken place. Having these feelings, I think I am bound to explain them in this House. I desire shortly to recall the attention of the House to the past transactions with regard to Ireland which have brought us into the position in which we are now placed. The executive duties of a Government are always its first and paramount duty. Let us see how the late Government treated this part of its functions—the part of its functions which bears on the liberty of the Queen's subjects. I do not ask the House to go very far. Fifteen months is enough for the purpose I have in view. Let me recall the attention of the House and the country to the position in which we were then placed with regard to the protection of the Queen's subjects in Ireland. That position was a very remarkable one. In May of last year, 15 months ago, the Crimes Prevention Act was about to expire. There was much speculation as to the course Mr. Gladstone's Government would pursue. It was believed at the time, and I believe now, that there was a great difference of opinion in the Cabinet, and that the Members of that Government had great difficulty in making up their minds as to what they were to do. The expiring of the Crimes Prevention Act at that time was entirely the fault of Mr. Gladstone's own Government. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for India of the last Government (the Earl of Kimberley) told us fairly just before the Dissolution that there was not public spirit enough in political Parties to render it safe to deal with this question as it ought to be dealt with. No doubt, that was the difficulty of the Government of which my noble Friend was a Member. The Government of Mr. Gladstone had an opportunity of dealing with this question as it ought to have dealt with it, and how did it utilize the opportunity? The Crimes Act could either have been completely renewed, or could have been renewed in a partial manner. They knew that, on the expiration of that Act, difficulties would arise in the British Parliament with regard to the government of Ireland. Yet they deliberately passed it for three years, knowing that the termination of that period would be close upon the Dissolution of Parliament. Was that an act of public spirit, of patriotism, or of duty towards Ireland? Was it a fulfilment of executive obligations to protect the Queen's subjects? Although I had left the Cabinet some little time, I felt so strongly on the subject that I ventured to volunteer a remonstrance to a distinguished Member of the Government on the shortness of the period for which the Bill was passed; and I received what I thought was an unsatisfactory reply. It may be said that there were provisions in it which were stronger than was necessary. The Act had been passed under a strong feeling of indignation—almost amounting to a panic—arising out of the dreadful murders comprising the Phoenix Park tragedy, and, no doubt, it did contain some provisions of so strong and drastic a character that no Government could put them in force. It may be said that there were some clauses too strong to be enacted for a longer period than three years; but, on the other hand, however, it contained provisions which could have been put in force, and with very useful results, as to which politicians agreed, when not speaking against each other, were of permanent value. Why were not they made permanent or passed for a longer time? Owing to the miserable Party temptations which have been deprecated, Mr. Gladstone's Government deliberately provided that the whole of this legislation should fall to the ground at a date when they knew that Parliament was to be dissolved, and when they knew from past experience it would be difficult for such legislation to be renewed.

EARL GRANVILLE: No, no!

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Does my noble Friend dispute that?

EARL GRANVILLE: I dispute both motive and facts.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Ah! You dispute the motive; then I will go upon public facts. This Act of Parliament was passed for three years; and can my noble Friend deny that everybody knew that those three years would terminate close to the end of the last Parliament? Was it a piece of sound public policy, was it an act of patriotism, to pass that Act for so short a period? Was that the way in which to perform a duty of so much importance? I think not, but there was something more. There were rumours in London that the Government was rapidly breaking up on this question; whether they were true or not I cannot say; but on the 15th of May what happened? Why, Mr. Gladstone came down to the House of Commons, and announced that the Government had determined to allow certain of the most severe parts of the Act to drop and to renew certain other parts, upon which he deliberately passed this eulogium—he said that he thought they might be applied to all sections of the community, and that they were valuable and equitable. It is well known to what clauses he referred; they were the procedure clauses, which were equitable and valuable for the protection of property. So they had this deliberate information given to them by the Government—that, in their opinion, there were certain provisions of the Act which they regarded as equitable, and thought might be employed with advantage for the protection of life and property in Ireland. But what happened next? Between the 15th of May and the fall of the Government there were repeated allusions both in and out of Parliament to the determination of the Government to renew certain portions of the Crimes Act; and on several of these occasions the Head of the Government vehemently protested that the clauses which the Government had determined to renew were not coercive. He denied on two or three occasions that the word coercion could be properly applied to them. On the 8th of June there happened the catastrophe on which the Government were defeated on another subject; and on the 7th of July, after the new Government had been formed, it was announced that the Government had determined not to renew any part of the Act. Mr. Gladstone made a speech in which he renewed his language about the clauses being valuable and equitable, and he actually described the clauses he had intended to renew as being of a remedial character. He went on to point out the distinction which he contended there was between the clauses that might be described as coercive, and those which were to be regarded as remedial clauses. The distinction which he drew was this—that there were certain clauses which acted in restraint of public liberty, and those he called coercive, and certain clauses which he contended would be valuable for the protection of life and property, and these he called the remedial clauses. Now, I accept that definition, and I ask why did not the Government, when they made that distinction, make the remedial clauses of a more permanent character and pass them for such a length of time as would have allowed Ireland and this country to have had a period of rest? If the clauses were remedial, why do the Leaders of the Liberal Party and Mr. Parnell denounce the operation of the measure as coercive? But apart from that, I think your Lordships will agree that when the noble Marquess came into power he would have been justified in proposing to renew the portions of the Act which his Predecessors had intended to renew. But if the Queen's Speech had recommended the recasting of the clauses which the Leaders of the Liberal Party had pronounced to be remedial and valuable what should we have seen? We know that the mere rumour of such an intention would have been received with a universal howl of "Coercion, coercion," from all the followers of Mr. Parnell. As you are aware, the noble Marquess came to the conclusion that any attempt to renew the Act, either in whole or in part, would have failed, and I think he had some good reasons for coming to that decision. This is another case of the pure effect of faction. If the clauses were remedial in May, 1885, they must be so now; if there is any value in the definition of these clauses which was given in May, 1885, it is as valuable now as it was then, unless they can say, as perhaps they will say, that they have some other means of enforcing the law—namely, that of giving it into the hands of the law-breakers. The noble Marquess has been much blamed—at the time he was twitted and jeered at—for not renewing the Crimes Act. In my opinion the noble Marquess would have done better if he had said—"Here are clauses which you have declared to be remedial and not to be coercive; we will pass them." If the noble Marquess had done that, he would have put the Leaders of the Liberal Party in a hole, out of which it would have been difficult for them to escape. There are many men of the Liberal Party who will vote black or white with Mr. Gladstone. I do not believe the Government could have done it, considering the obstruction they would have received from the Irish Members and the number of defections in the Liberal Party itself. My opinion is, the noble Marquess would have failed in carrying it. Therefore, I view with considerable lenity the decision of the noble Marquess to govern Ireland without any exceptional powers. But then I think a good deal of the language held at that time by Members of the Conservative Party was not very discreet, and not very sincere. They hoped they might scramble through the winter, and through the short period, perhaps, of their own existence; but I cannot believe that any part of the Conservative Party thought that Ireland would be governed under the sway of Mr. Parnell without taking an additional means of enforcing the existing law. But the truth is that a Government in the position of that of the noble Marquess at that time could hardly be said to be a Government at all. It is a great law of nature that all creatures that cannot live by strength are obliged to live by cunning; and the noble Marquess was obliged to live by cunning. He was in this position—that he was the Head of a Government in a minority in Parliament, and unable to withstand the hostile attacks of the Parties opposite, and he could hardly be said to be able to call his mind his own. I must say I believe the experiment has been, in my opinion, a disastrous one. We have had two Viceroys in succession trying this policy, and I must say that if the pick of this country had been chosen for two men from opposite sides of the House to try this policy the choice could not have been better. They were both Members of this House, men of the highest character, highly honourable men, incapable of doing anything mean towards any Party in the world; and it is impossible to read the accounts of these two Viceroys without feeling that they had been trying to govern by fear and flattery. There was a very curious incident reported the other day about Lord Aberdeen. Shortly before the change of Government the noble Earl in his progress came to Cork, and I saw it intimated, and it was most admirably descriptive of the whole facts of the case—"His Excellency was graciously pleased to accept a complete suit of Blarney tweed." These two Viceroys were clad from head to foot in Blarney tweed. Now, Blarney tweed may be a good thing in its way, and a part of a man's costume made of it might be of use; but to have a complete suit of it is rather too much even in Ireland, and I believe myself it has been a complete failure. I have received, within the last two or three days, a letter from a gentleman in Ireland, and whom I shall not name for the reasons which your Lordships may very well understand; but I can assure the House he is a person of very great ability. He is not one of the landlords of the country at all; but he is a native Irishman, and he is thoroughly competent to give an opinion. He gives the result of the government by Blarney. He says—

"It will be no simple task to restore the fabric of Government in the country, the Irish Government having so hampered and defeated the law it has fallen into utter contempt."

The Duke of Argyll

I have received another letter from the same gentleman this morning, in which he gives some details, showing that the League which is called the National League is in close alliance with the men who commit outrages. A man who had been under police protection came and asked that it might be withdrawn; and when the Inspector asked him what had happened he replied—"My apology has been received by the Leaders of the National League, and I am safe now." There you have coercion with a vengeance. The same complaint was heard from all officials; from the Poor Law Inspectors, from the Police Inspectors, and the magistracy. It would seem to be the set purpose of the Irish Government to break up the machinery of government, in order to say that nothing was left but to hand it over to the majority. That is an account of the result of trying to govern Ireland under the present condition of things without these clauses which the Leaders of the Liberal Party themselves declared to be necessary for the safety of the country. Is it not a mockery for Members of the two Parties to bandy about the word coercion, when they have Irishmen going about in fear of their lives under the desperate coercion of an illegal society? I now pass on. I wish to refer to the new departure--the General Election of 1885. I must say that I have always been one of those who think it is the perfect right of a Member of Parliament, and still more the perfect right of a Minister of the Crown in the place of Mr. Gladstone, to change his mind on any subject whatever; but then he ought to avow it is a change of opinion, and explain the grounds on which the change was made. I remember as a young man listening to the speeches of Sir Robert Peel in the Government of Lord Melbourne, and my impression, which afterwards turned out to be true, was that Sir Robert Peel was then shaking on the subject of Protection, for he said—"We must open the ports, and when open I shall never propose to shut them again." That was how his change came about. It was perfectly open; but look at the way in which the Leaders of the Liberal Party--the Parnellite section of the Liberal Party--changed their minds at the last Election. Mr. Gladstone, then Prime Minister, said the other day, for 15 years Mr. Bright knew very well he never opposed Home Rule in principle. I happened to be a Member of the Cabinet during that time. That 15 years takes us back to 1871, and on looking back on the speeches which Mr. Gladstone made during that period I find one delivered on the 27th of September, 1871. It is a long speech, and I am not going to trouble the House with it at any length. It is almost a violent speech against Home Rule. He distinguished in that speech between repeal of the Union and setting up a separate Parliament, Mr. Butt's proposal. He admitted that Mr. Butt's proposal was not repeal of the Union, but a separate Parliament for Ireland; and then he used these words with regard to it--

"Can any sensible man, can any rational man, suppose that at this time of day, in this condition of this world, we are going to disintegrate the great capital institutions of this country for the purpose of making ourselves ridiculous in the sight of all mankind in crippling any power we possess for bestowing benefits through legislation upon the inhabitants of Ireland?"

Could a stronger passage than that be given? Why, he not only opposed Home Rule on principle, but ridiculed it. I must say that those who have been Members of his Party have a right to have explained the circumstances under which this change has taken place. It is quite true that the form his argument took in subsequent years was this--"I do not know what you mean by Home Rule; define it." But when we come to close quarters we find Home Rule denounced as disintegration of the Empire. Mr. Gladstone and his Colleagues, after the General Election in last year, not only turned completely round to Home Rule, but he also ridiculed certain of his Colleagues for maintaining the opinions from which he had himself broken. This raised a feeling of exasperation among the Members of the Liberal Party, and it ended in the breaking up and disintegration of that Party. Now, my Lords, I want to ask my noble Friend, who has been so free to ask the noble Marquess opposite for a policy, what was the policy embodied and shadowed forth in the two Bills of the late Government? Let us stand back as an artist viewing a picture, and look at the general outlines of them; and, in the first place, I must say that for any Government to take it in hand to draw up a new British Constitution in the course of six weeks or two months was an act of the profoundest audacity. The British Constitution is not a written Constitution. It has not been made that way. It is not a Constitution that has risen suddenly; it has been made by gradual accretions from time to time; and I know no man in this country who by previous study or constructive mind and power is in a position to draw up a British Constitution, or to recast the existing one, and if anyone were to attempt it I should prophesy failure at the commencement. I ventured to prophesy the failure of these Bills at the beginning on that ground, and on that ground alone, and the result has been the ridiculous fiasco which we have witnessed, from which the Members of the right hon. Gentleman's Government retired in disgust. Those noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen posed as the friends of Ireland; but what was the nature of their scheme? First of all, and that was the root of the whole business, the expulsion of the Irish Members from Westminster—that was the forefront of the Bill; it was to get rid of the Irish Members. It was in that light the whole scheme was conceived; it was the triumph of Obstruction—the triumph of the flag which Mr. Parnell had run up and nailed to the masthead. The second object of the Bill, consequent upon the expulsion of the Irish Members from Westminster, was the exclusion of Ireland from all Imperial concerns. Is that a boon for Ireland? I know many Irishmen who do not think it, and who are furious with indignation. I can tell the House this—that soon after these Bills were announced I was brought into personal contact with many Irishmen in this country—distinguished men who did not mix with politics—and I never saw men so indignant and so disgusted—and justly indignant as I think—that they and their countrymen should be expelled from all concern in the Imperial Government. The third object of this Bill was the establishment of a separate Parliament in Dublin, with power to plunder the minority; and the fourth was to open a door of escape to certain classes in Ireland who refused these terms. What came of the scheme when we came to discuss it? In what I have said of the late Government I must make one, or rather two, exceptions—

that of Mr. John Morley, whose speeches have been eminently honest and straightforward, and my noble Friend the late Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer), who stuck to his principles, but with some dexterity avoiding some points of it. What happened with the other Members of the Government? My right hon. Friend once said that the resources of civilization were not exhausted. Is such a scheme as that to which I have referred a resource of civilization—to reduce Ireland to the position of a tributary Province, paying a fixed tribute and having nothing to do with Imperial concerns? Is that a resource of civilization, and is there any Government in Europe, or the world, that has ever resorted to such an expedient in regard to an integral part of their own Dominions? There is none. It is a resource of barbarism, and not civilization. If you tell me that is the right of the majority of the Representatives of Ireland, I say there is no man, not even Mr. Parnell, nor three-fifths of the Irish people who support him, who have the right to barter away the liberty of the other two-fifths for their own temporal benefit. Those Bills were a corrupt bargain for your own temporary convenience, made in order to avoid the difficulties of the problem of the government of Ireland. Mr. Parnell asked—"What are you afraid of? Surely Ireland is a small nation, and you cannot be afraid of her. You have your Army, and your Navy, and all the military resources of the country at your command; why, then, should you not allow us to do as we like?" My Lords, I answer that question by saying that we are afraid of nothing except dishonour; and we think it would be dishonourable to give up the minority of the Irish people to the uncontrolled power of the majority without laying down any fundamental principles for the protection of life, property, and honour. It is a bargain we have no right to make. Now, I cannot pass on, even for a moment, without referring to the strange attack made in the stress which has been laid by the Head of the late Government on the Union; and what I wish to point out is this—that the question of the morality of the Union of 1800 cannot be affected by the addition of 40 or 45 Members to the Parnellite Party in the House of Commons. Men who have been 50 years in Parliament, without saying a word upon this subject before, now jump up and say, "Was anything so immoral, so atrocious?"—I will not use the words that were used by the late Leader of the Liberal Party—but morality does not depend on Party exigencies, and I deny and repudiate the whole argument. In the first place, even if it were true, nothing would be more childish than to condemn the Union because it was corruptly obtained. How was the reformation of the English Church effected? Look at the conduct of Henry VIII. and his proceedings. Will Mr. Gladstone allow that the atrocities of Henry VIII. are a reason for pulling down the whole thing? But I deny the immorality of the proceeding. The Irish Parliament was a small and a very corrupt one. Mr. Gladstone himself has told us there were 120 or 130 placemen—a great many pensioners and holders of small boroughs—and I say it was impossible to get the Government out of their hands and destroy corruption, except by paying the price that existing law enabled them to demand. It was like ransoming the nation from the hands of bandits. The money paid was a ransom rather than a bribe, and it was to raise the Irish people to an equality with ourselves. Let me tell the Leaders of the Liberal Party that there is no man, and there is no Party in this country, who can with impunity revile the character of Mr. Pitt and his Party. Look at his speeches in 1800, and compare them with the shrieking speeches we have heard at this day. Look at the magnanimity of his tone towards Ireland, and the manifest desire he had to raise Ireland, to make her perfectly equal with England in a united Parliament, and to induce her to take an equal part in the management of Imperial affairs. As public opinion is now being instructed by such speeches as those of Mr. Gladstone, I take exception to the whole argument, and I maintain that the conduct of Mr. Pitt was pure and elevated conduct with a pure and elevated purpose. Well, my Lords, what happened to these two Bills when they came to be discussed before the constituencies? At the suggestion of the expulsion of the Irish Members from Westminster there was an immediate outcry by the Radical Party—"You are going to separate taxation and representation." The result was that the Government ran away before their own Bills. For instance, there was the expulsion of the Irish Members from the House of Commons. The people of this country are not particularly fond of the Irish Members as now represented in the House of Commons; but they had a political instinct that if these men were turned out they would have a separate Parliament for Ireland. What were the views of the Members of the late Government as to that matter? They were all different. Some of them said—"We will give up the expulsion;" and I think that even Mr. Gladstone consented to deal with the subject. Now, what was the next part of the scheme? It was the separation of Irish from Imperial concerns. I wish my noble Friends on the Front Opposition Bench to remember this—that the separation of Irish from Imperial concerns stands at the very root of the whole scheme. If you cannot make that separation, you cannot carry out your scheme. Well, what did Mr. Gladstone say in his opening speech, which has now been published as a pamphlet? He said that "it passed the wit of man to devise a separation between purely Irish and Imperial concerns." Well, then we have the Purchase Scheme. I must say that my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council is one of those who stuck to his guns about the Purchase Scheme, not, I think, with a perfect and complete resolution, because he talked about the number of years' purchase as a matter of detail. But Mr. John Morley throughout said—"I never will be a party to any Bill which does not secure the land interest in Ireland against confiscation." The other Members of the late Government did not say the same. I can compare their conduct to nothing but two familiar words—"cut" and "shuffle." Some of them cut the scheme altogether; others shuffled. Mr. Childers, at Edinburgh I think, said he would have nothing more to do with any Purchase Scheme. If the Members of the then Government differed so much during the Election, what right have they now to come to the Conservative Party and say, "Give us a policy"? Why, they had no policy to be called a policy to present to Parliament, not having made up their minds on the points to which I have referred. Just before the Dissolution I ventured to ask what was meant by purely Irish affairs—was it a purely Irish affair that Ireland should be allowed to conduct her business in peace? My noble Friend had not a word to say in reply. A separate Irish Parliament is no policy at all, unless you tell us what an Irish Parliament is to do. I maintain, therefore, that the late Government have no right whatever to ask their Successors for a policy, when they have produced two Bills from every part of which they have retreated in disastrous flight. May I now address a few words to the Benches opposite, and to the noble Marquess at the head of the new Government? I hope he will not be induced by such feeble questioners to announce some brand-new land policy for Ireland; that he will not fall into the trap into which Mr. Gladstone fell, of trying, with his unassisted resources, to frame a new Constitution for the British Empire. It is a task not to be accomplished even by my noble Friend opposite; if he attempts it he will assuredly fail. The noble Lords who are so fond of their own policy, but who cannot decide what it was, would run into it in one place, and the Parnellites in another; and possibly the noble Marquess would not be able to carry his disciplined forces with him in a policy so far-reaching and gigantic. But there are some preliminaries which I wish earnestly to urge on the attention, not only of the Members of the Conservative Party, but of the public of this country. The first thing is to clear our minds of the wretched cant that has been talked about the misgovernment of Ireland. It is all very well to say that we have not been wise in our treatment of Ireland, and that we repent of our errors. That is quite fair; but to say that we have done nothing but injure Ireland for centuries, and to say that all the evils of Ireland have resulted from our treatment of her, that is pure cant. Decidedly, it is not historically true. Let me take one or two of the greatest wrongs of Ireland. Take the Penal Laws. They were very bad and horrible, and much to be deprecated; but I believe Mr. Froude to be right when he says that the Penal Laws in Ireland were merely a rebound of the Penal Laws against the Protestants in France. They were a rebound of the echo of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; they were part of a system under which Europe then groaned. It was a period of universal persecution, and unquestionably the Protestants of Ireland would have been subjected to the same penalties if the Catholics had had the same opportunity. Bad, therefore, as those laws were, let us condemn them in the light of history, and not pretend that it was the peculiar fault of the British Government. Take, again, the restraints on trade. I declare that more harm was done to Ireland by our commercial legislation than by all the landlords and Land Laws in that country; but here, again, it was a period of universal Protection. Do we not know that our own municipalities were founded on Protection? Every Scotch burgh was steeped up to the ears in Protection. It was an era of Protection, and England is not to be blamed in that sense for having pursued the general and, as I believe, the wretched policy of that day. Well, then, with regard to the land system. Now, on this point I wish to say a word, because I see that Mr. John Morley said that we have given to Ireland a land system the most wretched in the world. There never was a more gross historical misrepresentation. The Land Laws of Ireland, in so far as they are the same with our laws—as they are to a great extent—are the same Land Laws which prevail all over civilized Europe. What is peculiar and miserable in the Irish Land Law is a direct descent and derogation of the old Celtic customs, purely Irish in its origin. Look at the account which Sir John Davis gives of this subject; look at the miseries which existed beyond the Pale in the old Irish Celtic customs; look at the statement which he makes of the desire on the part of the unfortunate Irish to be brought within the Pale that they might enjoy the protection of the English landlords. They are poisoning the ears of the Irish people who do not know that the worst customs of the Irish land system, and which have led more than anything else to the misery of the country and the poverty and superstition that exist, are directly descended from their own Celtic Chiefs. Then take a modern case, and look at the last Land Act, which you passed yourselves. What did my noble Friend the late President of the Council say? At Lancaster, during the Election Campaign, he said that the last Irish Land Act was a right and salutary Act; but the Irish themselves would not allow it to be worked.

It came to this, then—that the Irish people are not allowed to have the benefit of the Land Act, because the National League are determined that it should not be put in operation. They will not accept land legislation from a British Parliament. In the letter which I have read from a friend he mentions a curious fact. One of the prominent parts of Mr. Gladstone's Land Act was that of the free right of sale of the tenants. But the National League have denounced the farmers who sold their tenant right, and I am credibly informed that a great many farmers are not allowed to sell their tenant right on account of the new rule of the National League. Here we have the miseries and distress in Ireland all arising from the Irish themselves thwarting in every conceivable way the boon which the British Parliament is desirous of giving them. Take the Cottage Act, which passed your Lordships' House a few years ago. It was grumbled at and objected to by some noble Lords. They thought it a dangerous Bill; but we have some Irish legal Peers, and they told us that it was all right, and would do no harm. I am told now that the amount of gross jobbery being perpetrated under that Act is considerable; and, as we know from other sources of information, the labourers of Ireland are getting no benefit whatever from your measures. On the contrary, they are worse off than ever. My friend says that the measures of Mr. Gladstone are like the story of the veterinary surgeon who sent in a bill with this heading—"For curing the mare until it died." Mr. Gladstone is very fond of referring to Edmund Burke. Here is a passage from Edmund Burke, in which he uses this expression in a letter—"I must speak the truth; I must say that all the evils of Ireland originated within itself." I venture to propound in this House now that the miseries of Ireland are not mainly due to misrule, but to the mischievous customs of the people themselves. I wish to say a word before I sit down as to the demand made on the present Government for a policy. The late Government have no right to make that demand; but, at the same time, I am not prepared to deny that there are things to be done for Ireland. I have long had an opinion—and I am rather ashamed that I have not publicly expressed it; but I express it now with the fullest conviction of its truth—that in our dealings with the Roman Catholic population of Ireland we have not been fair, or even reasonable. It is part of the ultra-Liberal creed—of Liberalism as distinguished from liberality—that religion should be separated from education. That is a doctrine which is resolutely resisted by the Roman Catholic priesthood. We have insisted upon enforcing secular education. I maintain that we should go as far, at least, as they do in Canada, and allow purely denominational education, avowed to be such, as such, in every part of Ireland in proportion to the population. That is the rule in Canada, where there is a large mixed population. I believe our national system has been getting more and more denominational in fact; but still, in principle, the present system is opposed to the feelings and sentiments of the Irish Roman Catholics, and for those feelings, however much I may differ from their Church, I have the strongest sympathy and respect, and with which, as I differ from the Roman Catholic Church, I do not feel entitled to interfere. We have been told by Mr. Gladstone that for the last 15 years he has never resisted Home Rule on principle. That is a declaration as to the perfect sincerity of which I have no doubt; but certainly he has contrived to conceal his opinion from those about him. Some may have suspected it; others may have had a doubt; but there is no public utterance which would lead to that conviction. But I imagine that the people of Ireland have felt that they were dealing with a mind that was uninformed upon these subjects—with a mind that was not firm, just as a vicious horse feels the hand of a weak rider. And the result has been what might be expected. When Irish tenants have been urged to buy their farms under the favourable terms offered them by the late Government, their reply has been—"No; why put ourselves in that position just now, when we know that the Liberal Government will concede anything to successful agitation? Let us bide our time, and we will get land, if not for nothing, at least at a nominal price." My own conviction is that that is the feeling at the root of the difficulties with which we have to deal. There is a sense of weakness and insecurity and uncertainty as to the very fundamental doctrines of human society. Everything is giving way under the feet of those who long for some firm foundation on which to stand. In the most remarkable Address that was ever delivered—the farewell Address of Washington—he said—

“All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive to this fundamental principle, obedience to the law, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a Party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community.”

I commend these words to the growing Democracies. I am myself for a Democracy, provided it be an honest and a virtuous Democracy.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I am desirous of saying a few words with reference to that part of the speech of the noble Earl opposite which, in some degree, referred to myself. He recapitulated some of my words and deeds during the late Administration of my noble Friend the present Prime Minister. I do not feel that I can take exception to his inferences from those words and deeds, because it was difficult to know what inferences he drew; but if there was an innuendo, it was one conveying that I was unable to continue as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland owing to my being unable to agree with my Colleagues. If that was what he intended to convey, I can only tell him that he is entirely deceived. Reference has also been made to the government of Ireland during my Viceroyalty; but when my noble Friend the Duke of Argyll said that the whole course of my Administration in Ireland was to govern by flattery and blarney, he went far beyond the facts of the case. I can only say that the materials at my command were scanty; but such as they were they were fully utilized. The materials were insufficient, but the law was enforced with remarkable success. Convictions were obtained at the Winter Assizes, and there was not a single miscarriage of justice. I quite agree as to the importance of the maintenance of the law; but there is another question besides that of the maintenance of the law, and that is the sufficiency of the law. There were certain parts of that Crimes Act the value of which I never concealed, and the absence of which would have rendered government in Ireland very difficult. I have tried the full force of the existing law in Ireland, and I do not hesitate to say that that law was insufficient for the purpose; but, having said that, I wish to add that I adhere to my opinion that the remedy for that state of things is not the enactment of exceptional and temporary legislation. I believe that exceptional and temporary legislation really weakens the hands of the Government, inspires a sense of disquiet, and is calculated in the long run to weaken rather than to strengthen the authority of the law. In 1844 or 1845, when the state of Ireland was as bad as it could be, Sir Robert Peel deprecated appealing to Parliament for exceptional legislation. The remedy lies in strengthening the law, but in making that law at the same time general and permanent, and such as would apply to all parts of the United Kingdom. During the last two or three months many people have attributed to me very different opinions from those which I hold. I desire at once to express my satisfaction, at the opening of a new Parliament, that upon this great question—after long controversy—the decision of the country has been clear and undeniable. It would have been a great misfortune if the country had seemed to be halting between two opinions. I understand the opinion of the country, as expressed in the present Parliament, to be this—there is to be a complete supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in Irish matters; in other words, whatever liberties are granted, whatever concessions are made, the control of the Imperial Parliament is to be clear, real, and effective. The Bill of Mr. Gladstone did not secure this. It created an Irish Parliament and an Irish Executive responsible to the Irish Parliament. It did not leave the effective control in the Crown, because the Crown would be advised by the Irish Ministers, and not by the Imperial Ministers. This was the broad issue that was before the country, and I hope all reasonable men will accept its verdict. I believe that within the limits of the popular decision there is enough to be done, not only to provide for the due administration, enforcement, and maintenance of the law, but also to give a reasonable amount of contentment to the Irish people. One of the great faults of Mr. Gladstone's scheme was that it must have failed in the nature of things to bring contentment to Ireland. It stimulated, but it could not satisfy, hopes and aspirations. But the most grievous part of the recent proceedings is that, by his failure, Mr. Gladstone has, by raising these aspirations, by creating these false hopes, deferred to a more distant day anything like a real settlement of the Irish Question. Over and above that it overlooked the A B C of the question—the existence of discordant races and creeds in that country. The Belfast riots proved the miscalculation that was made on this point. No real provision was made to meet it. The fact remains that you have to deal with two distinct nations; and any settlement made in ignorance of that fact will be a settlement in name and not in reality. I cordially echo the hope that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) will not express any opinion on this subject at present, but will preserve at present that reticence which characterizes the Speech from the Throne already hinted at. It is a problem both great and grave which is before the Government. I will not say that I think it an insoluble problem; that would be to give up all statesmanship. But it needs every advantage, and not the least that of time for its consideration, to produce anything which shall give peace and contentment to Ireland, and which shall prevent its being in the future, as it has been in the past, the sport of Party and the mere football of factions. Some of the principal evils may be summed up in this formula—too much has been extorted, or has seemed to be extorted, from the English Government by fear; each concession has been used too much as a lever to obtain more. From first to last, through successive Governments, there has been a failure of that continuity of policy which alone can give rest and peace. I would urge my noble Friend to consider how far some change may not be made in Private Bill legislation. Nothing can be less satisfactory than that Gas and Water Bills, which concern the purely domestic life of Ireland, should be dealt with here, at Westminster. Then I hope the noble Marquess will turn his attention to the burning question of education, and especially higher, technical, and industrial education. There is no light in Ireland burning so brightly as that of industrial education. It has done more good, probably, than anything else; and the work is capable of almost indefinite expansion, with results which can only contribute to the public safety. Some parts of Ireland are in the position of an undeveloped Colony. There can be no prosperity in the absence of good roads to enable the people to bring their produce to the markets. Then I hope the noble Marquess will consider the reconstruction of certain parts of the Executive Government, and in particular the powers of the Lord Lieutenant. That important functionary possesses powers just enough to expose him to misunderstanding and misrepresentation, but not sufficient to enable him to render any real service. There can be no doubt that in certain parts of Ireland the Land Question is at the root of the difficulty. There are certain parts of Ireland in which the poverty is so great—the condition of the people is such that, until this is remedied, all chance of attaining prosperity is simply delusive. Time after time this has been stated by statesmen, travellers, and writers; but still there is the same story to tell that was true 100 years ago. There are many distinguished Viceroys who have been brought face to face with this grinding pauperism. Why have they all failed? Many reasons might be given; but perhaps this reason would be found deep down in the question—there has been a serious want of accord in the English and Irish nations. The Irish heart was not attuned to concord, and until that sympathy is in some degree restored there cannot be a real and satisfactory settlement of the Irish Question. I have heard a great deal lately as to the value of giving identical institutions to England and Ireland. It is a very large question; but I must say it is true only up to a certain point. Ireland does not want exactly the same institutions locally as England, and could not endure them if she had. The condition of things are different in the two countries; and an identity of local institutions in Ireland, if forced upon her, may not only be useless, but will, in my opinion, be made very harmful. The greatest possible caution ought to be observed by those who press forward that view. I will only add that there are two sides to this question. On the one hand, there is the promotion of education, material interests, and the development of the country, which would call out all the local energies, and which would, to a certain extent, satisfy local aspirations; and, on the other hand, there is the maintenance and enforcing of the law, the supremacy of the Crown, the authority of Parliament; and, lastly, the maintenance of the sanctity of private rights. It may be difficult to reconcile these different and apparently conflicting interests. But I cannot agree that it is impossible. There are many plans. I hope the Government will carefully consider all these. I hope they will take time to do this. They have my best wishes. For several years there has been a time of public disgust. Confidence has been shaken, credit has been damaged, and many questions which call aloud for settlement at home and abroad in the consolidation of the Empire are waiting. I wish them energy to discharge their task, and long life in which to perform it; and when the time of their political decease arrives—as I suppose it must arrive for them as for other Governments—I can wish them nothing better than that it should be recorded of them in Scriptural language—"For many years the land had rest."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, in taking part in this debate, which has been singularly varied, I wish to point out that it has wandered further from the original subject than was submitted to your Lordships than any debate that I remember. I freely admit that perhaps it was due to the scantiness of original matter rather than to your Lordships. But I do not intend to attempt to go into all the matters that have arisen in this debate. I will rather endeavour to answer one or two of the criticisms that have been passed upon ourselves, and give such reply as I can to the benevolent questions of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). And, in the first place, I will venture to say a word in defence of our action in asking Parliament to go on with the Business of the Session now instead of putting it off, as the noble Earl suggested we might have done, until October. There seems to us a vital objection to the latter course. The public money is granted till the 1st of November. If we had met on the 15th of October, say, and it was known that if only 15 days passed away without the passing of the Appropriation Act the Government of the country could no longer be carried on, I am afraid considerable apprehension would have taken hold of the public mind. Without imputing to any persons a desire to embarrass the Government, or to lengthen the proceedings of Parliament to any unreasonable extent, I do not think it probable, knowing that, with the best intentions, the other House of Parliament is not always able to confine its labours within reasonable limits—I do not think it at all improbable that the limit of the 1st of November could have been reached without the necessary financial provision being made for the year. We do not think it right to run such a risk as this, and we have appealed to the patriotism of Parliament to close the Session forthwith. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) has spoken of the many omissions in the Queen's Speech. Well, they say that the size of a tree depends upon the size of the root from which it springs. Possibly the magnitude of the discussion on the Queen's Speech depends on the length of the Speech to be discussed. We were anxious to limit the Speech to that matter for which Parliament has been called together, in the traditional words which are addressed to the House of Commons at the beginning of every new Parliament; and, therefore, the Queen's Speech on this occasion is confined to recommendations as to the passing of the Estimates. We could not recommend the passing of legislation, because we do not propose that any legislation should be passed in this fragment of a Session. With respect to the statement on foreign and Colonial affairs, to which reference has been made, it must be remembered that not much more than six weeks have passed since another Queen's Speech was addressed to Parliament containing the views of the Ministers of the day on all those questions. There has hardly been time enough to make any new statement with respect to public affairs that should have the merit of novelty; and if it had the merit of novelty, it might have the demerit of expressing views in a formal document different from those which Her Majesty had been previously advised to express. But I shall be very happy to answer, as far as I can, the one or two questions which the noble Earl has addressed to me on that point. The most important question was that, I think, with regard to Burmah; and with respect to Burmah I have to acknowledge that it is not in a satisfactory condition. How it reached that unsatisfactory condition I do not know. We were not in Office, or in possession of official knowledge, during the time that process took place. I think when we left Office the annexation was proceeding in a very healthy way, and there was every prospect of the speedy restoration of order and the government of Burmah in peace and prosperity. I do not wish for a moment to suggest that the noble Earl opposite is responsible for matters not turning out in a different way. I do not suggest, and I do not in the least know; but I deny that we are responsible for what took place between the beginning of February and the present time. If the process has been difficult and has gone wrong, I daresay it is from causes which are unavoidable; but, at all events, it was from causes for which we cannot be held responsible. With respect to the actual state of affairs, although they are very unsatisfactory, it would be very exaggerated language to say that there was any cause for apprehension and alarm. I think an intelligible mistake has been made in not using enough men and not expending as much money as was necessary at first; but as soon as the hot weather is over measures of a larger character will be taken, and, as far as I can judge from the opinions of those who are entitled to pronounce an opinion on the subject, the difficulties in the way of the restoration of order which exist will speedily be removed. I hope when the cold weather comes we shall have but the regret that we have not been able to restore it sooner. I do not apprehend that there is any doubt of the anticipations drawn that British rule in Burmah will result both in an extension of trade to this country, and also much greater happiness and well-being to the people of Burmah itself. I have no fear whatever but that those anticipations will be realized. With respect to the Afghan Frontier, I think there is a little misapprehension on that subject also with respect to the withdrawal of our Commission. What has taken place has not been stated with absolute accuracy. The matters at issue between us and the Russian Government, though of some considerable importance, are not very large in point of territory. The knowledge with respect to it is complete. The discussion can be carried on quite as well between London and St. Petersburg as it can in the desolate regions where the demarcation is to take place. There is also always a considerable inconvenience in leaving British officers throughout the tremendous winter of those regions far from any support, far from their own officers, and still farther from their own Government. It is impossible to say, with the best will on the part both of the Russian and Afghan Governments, what accidents might happen in a country which is, of course, only very partially governed and partially controlled; and we do not think it desirable, merely for these 20 miles of frontier that still remain in dispute, that the Commission should spend another winter in those regions. But some time will elapse, and I think there is every reason to hope that the Governments will come to an agreement on the subject. With respect to other matters of foreign affairs, the noble Earl inferred from the silence of the Speech that there was nothing in foreign affairs which deserves mention or which could cause solicitude. Perhaps that would be carrying an optimist view of the situation too far. But there is nothing to cause apprehension. Many regions of the world have been for some time past, and are still, in a state of equilibrium which cannot be described as stable. The maintenance of peace depends upon many accidents, as noble Lords opposite have experienced during the last six months of Office. They saw how many difficulties were arising from the conflict of rising nationalities and old Dominions in the South-East of Europe. I will not say, any more than in the last spring, all cause of solicitude is entirely taken away; but I do not think there is any good cause for perplexity. The policy of this country has been very clearly marked out for a considerable time, and it is our intention to adhere to the traditions that we have inherited. The integrity of the Turkish Empire, as defined by Treaties, is of great importance in our judgment, as it has been in the judgment of many statesmen in past times—of great importance to the peace of Europe—of great importance to the interests of this country. While desiring to do all we can to insure the welfare and the progress of the populations of those regions, we still hold by the integrity of the Turkish Empire as one of the conditions on which the present European system is based. We have every hope that, in holding that view, we shall, as in times past, have the support of our Allies. We heartily approve the action initiated partly by ourselves, and carried on consistently by noble Lords opposite, which was directed towards maintaining the integrity of the Turkish Empire during the spring and summer of this year. That was a specimen of the difficulties which may arise, and it was an indication of the ease with which, under firm treatment, those difficulties will disappear; and though from time to time causes of alarm will seem to arise, though they will be magnified by the eagerness of rumour, and though there may be in the political sky ambiguous indications from time to time, I still maintain the firm hope and belief that by adhering steadily to the policy which has been the English policy for a great number of years, we shall contribute, and contribute effectively and with success, to the permanent maintenance of the peace of Europe. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) and the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon) have urged us not to be too speedy in announcing a policy for Ireland. That is not precisely the advice we got from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). I do not wish to go much into the past. A great deal of the discussion has turned on the past, no doubt most legitimately; but I think I should, perhaps, be unnecessarily wasting the time of the House if I were to follow far into the subjects that have been opened up. Among many other well-worn subjects, the question of our innocence or guilt for not renewing the Crimes Act has been brought again before your Lordships. I have nothing to add to what I have already said on that subject. May I say that I think the importance of the Crimes Act, as such, or at least some particular clauses of it, has been a great deal overrated. Whether any legislation was then or may be hereafter required in aid of the Criminal Law in Ireland is quite another matter. I am ready to admit that our policy of last year is open to discussion on that point. I am not ready, however, to admit that the success or the failure of our Irish policy depended on those particular clauses of the Crimes Act on which so much has been said. I think they were valuable, but their importance has been very much over-rated. I can only say, with regard to this vexed question of our conduct in not proposing special criminal legislation in July last year, that those who judge us must remember the extraordinarily peculiar circumstances of the time. We had not a tenure of Office in the ordinary sense. We were governing during a necessary interregnum—an interregnum produced by the peculiar action of the Reform Bill and the sudden fall of the Government which passed it. The question before us was not, in my mind, whether we should pass criminal legislation or not. I am perfectly convinced that it was impossible to have passed it, but the question was whether it was so necessary for the purpose of governing Ireland that if we were not prepared to pass it we ought to have refused to take Office altogether. I admit that that is a question open to discussion. It might have been our duty to refuse Office at that time because we could not pass criminal legislation. I did not think so. Believing, at that time, that Home Rule was out of the question—both Parties were thoroughly agreed in repudiating it—I looked upon the movement in Ireland as in the nature of a transitory movement which would have its rise, its culmination, and its fall, like all moral movements of the kind, and I thought we were approaching a period in which additional criminal legislation could be dispensed with. I do not know whether any additional criminal legislation would have done any good; but of this I am certain—that it is a mistake to ridicule, as the noble Duke did, what he was pleased to call the “blarney suit of conciliation”—that is to say, the assumption of a conciliatory attitude in governing the people of Ireland. I think we were perfectly right in doing all we could by conciliation to put an end to the war against the law which unhappily prevailed. I am sure that if our efforts failed it was not due to any want of devotion or want of ability on the part of my noble Friend the then Viceroy (the Earl of Carnarvon), who did all that was possible to be done in the circumstances. I am willing to leave to the judgment of the House whether we erred or did not; but it is merely a question of history, which has no bearing on the present. The whole surface of the problem has been changed by what has taken place during the present year. I do not wish to discuss in a controversial spirit the measures proposed by the late Government; but a tremendous change in the attitude of political Parties, the abandonment of the position which had been held for so long, the proposal of measures which would have had a revolutionary effect in the strictest sense of the word, which would have put those at the head who have been under, and those under who had been at the head—measures which would have placed the whole machinery for the repression of crime in Ireland in the hands of those who hitherto, with too good reason, have been suspected of being themselves the favourers and the instigators of crime—I say, such measures as these, such a history as that which has been the history of the relations of England to Ireland during the past half-year, have changed the whole of this problem; and I, for one—and I am sure my Colleagues too—do not feel competent, until we have been able to study the question with much greater care than we have hitherto given to it, to offer that solution of the problem which the noble Earl calls upon us to give. We were returned with one mandate—to maintain the Union. We believe that we represent accurately the wishes of the people of this country when we say that it is our duty to give our efforts, above everything else, to the restoration of social order and the maintenance of legal rights. It is our duty, besides this, to study carefully every measure by which prosperity or contentment in Ireland can be secured. But when I am asked to go into details—when I hear talk of Irish Government Offices, of the educational question, of the reform of the government, of local government, which is not an Irish question, but a United Kingdom question, and which must be dealt with on lines generally similar at the same time over the whole country at once—when these matters are suggested for discussion, I can only answer that, whatever legislation we may have to propose, time, consideration, and inquiry are, above all things, necessary, so that we will give the utmost attention to all these questions, but that we are not ready now to furnish any sketch of our future legislative proposals. I have indicated the broad lines within which the policy of the Government must be kept; but into the details I could not go with any prospect of satisfaction to your Lordships. But I am bound to recognize that there are matters into which we may inquire, and there are administrative measures we may take. My noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon) has spoken of the material resources of Ireland, which he justly said require the attention of the Government for the purpose of their future development. There is no subject which, I think, is more worthy of the attention of the Government than that to which my noble Friend has drawn attention. I hope that we shall give full and special inquiry to that question of developing the local resources of Ireland, following, in some respects, the steps of our Predecessors; and I hope, also, in some respects, improving on their doctrines. The development of the fisheries, the extension of arterial drainage, of local railways, and many other things of that kind, which have occupied the attention of Governments in the past, but in respect to which nothing like a full or complete or satisfactory determination has been arrived at—these things will occupy our careful attention during the Recess. With respect to social order, I think I can say that we have shown that we are not without a policy. Measures of the most summary, of the most effective kind, have been taken for the purpose of restoring order in Belfast, and they have succeeded. I cannot mention those terrible conflicts without expressing the horror which they must have excited in men's minds. I think that they are well fitted to prove to the British public the abnormal conditions of society in Ireland, and how far removed is the harmony and agreement which does so much to make our institutions work well in this country. But I would not express an opinion further in detail in regard to these proceedings, because an inquiry was set on foot by the late Government, to which we shall give expansion, and possibly we may seek special Parliamentary powers—an inquiry which will place on the firm basis of fact the controversies as to the responsibility of the various parties in connection with them, which can now be only a matter of speculation. I will only say, in passing, that I do not think there is any ground—at least, any prima facie ground—except what may be shown by subsequent inquiry, for impugning the conduct of the Constabulary. As to the statement that constables have been brought from the South to the North, that is, I believe, no exceptional proceeding. I think it is usual, and it is obviously convenient, to appoint constables in those districts where they have no special connection; and I do not think there was an intention or wish to offer anything like a challenge, or to produce anything in the nature of division. I believe the police have, upon the whole, on this as on other occasions, behaved with courage, discretion, and discipline. Of any individual case of indiscipline the Commission will take cognizance; but in dealing with a body like the Royal Irish Constabulary we are bound to remember that they have borne a great part in maintaining the English Government in Ireland, and we are bound to consider all their actions with the utmost consideration, forbearance, and generosity, and not hastily to believe that they have fallen away from the merits which in former times they have so prominently displayed. There can be no doubt whatever that it was by the concentration of the military that the uproar was put down. The state of disorder was so great that it would have justified the exercise of far sterner measures than those to which we were driven; but I believe it is often the wisest and kindest thing to employ the military at once in cases of that kind; and I believe that the result obtained of the experiment in Belfast will be a guide to the Irish Government in the future. With respect to social order generally in Ireland, it is difficult to say that it is in a state unusually bad. Unfortunately, we have been accustomed to phenomena which have not in this present year been repeated in any excessive form. But there still is, undoubtedly, a considerable amount of outrage, though small as compared with that of former years, when it attracted the attention of Parliament. I will not trouble your Lordships with many figures; I will simply state one or two just to show, with respect to the law in Ireland, how matters really stand. In 1882, which was one of the worst years, the total number of outrages for the six months ending on the 31st of July was 2,310; whereas, in 1886, they were 551—so that they have fallen to about a quarter of what they were in the former year. With respect to their progress, they seemed to have increased in intensity in the beginning of the year up to June, and the month of July shows a rather better record. But the most remarkable circumstance with respect to them is that they are mainly confined to the South-West of Ireland. The counties of Kerry, Clare, and a portion of Limerick, I think, take not far from half of all outrages recorded. We have reason to doubt whether the administrative arrangements are as good as they might be for maintaining order in these counties. For instance, in the county of Kerry there are 300 more policemen than the ordinary establishment. Well, that is a considerable number for a single county, and you would imagine that it would give very considerable aid in the detection of crime; but the fact is that almost the whole of these 300 policemen are employed in the practice of what is called personal protection. That is to say, about 300 policemen—I believe the exact number is 292—are engaged in the protection of 145 persons. Of course, that is a very small contribution to the figures of a whole county, even if they were divided equally among those 145 persons; but I find that a noble Earl with whom we are all acquainted, the Earl of Kenmare, employs no less than 38 policemen for his individual protection. A lady who lives in the same county takes 32 policemen for her own protection. Now, it is, of course, very desirable that there should be protection for valuable lives; but I believe that each policeman costs, when you take all expenses, something like £100. I cannot help thinking that we might protect the Earl of Kenmare more cheaply than that, and that the £3,800 which will represent the whole cost of the 38 policemen shows some weakness in the organization. Of course, I must not be supposed to impute the smallest blame to the Earl of Kenmare; but I say that the system has drifted into an unreasonable shape, and that it is a matter which requires careful overhauling and inquiry, and probably entire reorganization. We think it is a matter that requires a fresh eye, and that order will not be restored unless we can bring to bear some new arrangement, or, at all events, that the attention of minds which have been engaged in the solution of similar problems in other parts of the globe—of men who know how to exercise discipline, and who know how to extract from a small force the greatest possible effect—that by the employment of some such men we might attain to a system more effective than that which I have indicated, and that so large a number of police may, under such guidance, really accomplish the prevention and the detection of crime in those districts. We propose to send Sir Redvers Buller to control all the local Police Force and the local organizations; and we believe—at least, we have good hope—that, even with our present powers, and without any large expenditure of force, we shall be able to bring to an end the outrages which now disgrace parts of Ireland. At the same time, we must not look upon social order in Ireland as entirely or mainly a matter of outrages. If it were merely the outrages we had to consider, Ireland would be now in a tolerably satisfactory condition, because the outrages are restricted to certain very limited districts, or, at least, the excessive number of outrages are so restricted. The evil we really have to deal with is the organized system of intimidation. I do not say that any reorganization of the police can reach that evil. It has grown larger and larger. Boycotting has extended, not so much, but still a little, since this time last year, and intimidation appears to have reached that point that it is impossible in many parts of Ireland to obtain evidence of it. I merely indicate it as the most difficult of the problems that we have to solve, and I am sure that in that sentiment I shall have the assent of two or three former Viceroy of Ireland. The precise mode in which we are to deal with it I do not venture to indicate. I merely wish to point out to the House that until we have dealt with it we have done nothing to restore the freedom of the innocent and to provide for the punishment of the guilty in Ireland. That is one of the first and most pressing duties of the Government, and we shall address ourselves to it with an earnest hope that either by the use of the powers of the law, or, if they do not suffice, by the further powers which we shall ask of Parliament, we shall be able gradually to diminish and extinguish this great evil. My noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon), I think, referred to the Land Question, to the total poverty of many of the cultivators, and to the fearful and appalling problems which that poverty presents, not only to the Government, but to all who wish well to Ireland. The Land Question is one on which we have had anxious and even angry controversies in this House. I do not wish to go back on questions that are past now; but I did not approve of the legislation of 1881, and I offered my protest against it. I was overruled, but I have ventured more than once to press on your Lordships, both in Office and in Opposition, that it is not open to an English Party so to carry its opinion into practice as to break away from a policy which Parliament and the people of this country have, after due deliberation, laid down. That Act of 1881 has passed; it has been acted upon; it is part of the policy of Ireland, and I wish to say this, in order that it may not be imputed to me as an inconsistency, that I do not see on what other theory of procedure Government by Party is possible in this country. The Act of 1881 was a compromise and bargain, and I should have been very glad at the time if the landlords had resisted it; but, as a matter of fact, they did not resist it. They resisted partly, but they were content that the Act should pass. Whether they liked it or not, they did not think it right that an Act which was desired by vast numbers of Irishmen, and of which great things were hoped, should be hindered by their objections. I therefore say that this bargain, such as it was, they accepted, and that bargain is one which I think Parliament is bound to observe. The bargain was this—the landlords were deprived of that to which they had an undoubted right—namely, the power of changing their tenants or taking their lands into their own hands, and fixing their own rents in the open market. In place of that power, in consideration of that sacrifice, they were offered for 15 years a fixity of rent, which under all circumstances they were to receive. Now that bargain, in one sense, has been unfulfilled. The landlords do not receive the rents—the judicial rents—that have been fixed by the Courts. I do not say that they receive them nowhere; but in many parts of Ireland they do not receive them. What is the cause of that failure? My Lords, I think that is a subject, among many others, which we are bound to investigate with very great care. Undoubtedly the first and most obvious reason why they have not received their rents is that there exist illegal combinations for the purpose of preventing the payment of rents—which hinder even those who are able and willing to pay their rents from doing so. With these illegal combinations it is our duty to grapple. We hear of them in every direction. Everybody must have heard numberless stories of the occupants of estates previously contented and willing to pay rent suddenly demoralized by the advent of the Nationalist Leaders, and persuaded to refuse the obligations which they were ready to carry out. Everybody must have heard stories of tenants forced to pretend that they did not pay their rent, yet wishing honestly to discharge the obligations they had incurred, meeting their landlords privately, and giving them the rent, and entreating them to give them no receipt for it. All these things exist, I am afraid, in many parts of Ireland. They prove the great force exercised upon the tenants by these illegal combinations, and in justice to both tenants and landlords we are bound to seek to probe the evil, to see how far it spreads, and to examine what remedies we can apply to it. We propose to issue a Commission for that purpose. At the same time there is another matter we must also inquire into. It is loudly said that the cause of non-payment of rent, at all events in some parts of Ireland, is that the tenants cannot pay, because the price of produce has fallen so low that the payment of rent has become impossible. I have great doubts whether that is true to a great extent, and I doubt it for two reasons. In the first place, the fall in price of produce which has taken place in this country—a fall which has created so profound a depression in agriculture—is a fall chiefly in wheat and barley, two grains which Ireland does not to a very great extent grow. There has, no doubt, been a fall in the price of stock; but that appears to be recovering itself. There is one article of produce in which I am told the depreciation has been very considerable—I mean butter. Whether that depreciation is due to a fall in the price in the market, or whether it is owing to the troublous times the manufacturer has, is a matter which, I think, is open to controversy; but, undoubtedly, there has been a fall in that article. But though that is the case, I am not at all sure that the judicial rents were not fixed with a perfect consciousness on the part of the Judges that a fall in the price was going on. That fall has been going on now for several years, and it is highly improbable that the Courts, in assigning judicial rents, have not taken that into consideration. However, I think that, considering this matter has been stated so loudly and on such high authority, and considering that if we were to refuse an inquiry we should be accused of neglect—I think it ought also to be a subject for investigation by Commission; but in saying this I wish to guard myself against one misapprehension—we do not contemplate any revision of the judicial rents. We do not think it would be honest, in the first place, and we think it would be exceedingly inexpedient. If you announce a revision of judicial rents, you practically destroy all hopes of finality in agricultural questions. Neither landlord nor tenant will be able to count on the legislation of the future with the slightest glimpse of certainty. The tenants will constantly have before them the belief, and the landlords will constantly have before them the fear, that, under the pressure of some future agitation or in the light of some future controversy, Parliament may be forced to fresh legislation; and that confidence, that repose, that rest, which my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon) said is the one thing which this country, and especially Ireland, needs will be indefinitely postponed. But if it should turn out that the Courts have made blunders, and that there is that impossibility in any case of paying rent, I think it is not the landlords who should bear the loss. I think this would be one of the cases for the application of the principle of purchase by the State, and that the State, and not the landlords, must suffer for the errors that have been made. The question of policy does not arise at present; but it is so common in Ireland to exaggerate that which is being done or intended that I thought it necessary to guard myself in giving any countenance to the idea that any remission of judicial rents was in our contemplation. My Lords, I mentioned the system of purchase, and the Commission that has been proposed will have that question principally in view. I do not think that its most earnest advocates can say that the Act of 1881 has solved the Land Question. I believe it is far more true to say, as the Marquess of Hartington said at the time it was passed, that it was only a modus vivendi until a sounder principle could be introduced. The duality of ownership is not consistent with the prosperity of the country. We cannot, of course, go back to the system which existed before the Act of 1881. We must go forward to that sounder system which consists in converting the judicial leaseholder into a freeholder as fast as we can. Of course, this can only be done by degrees and tentatively—it cannot be done suddenly by any heroic act; but we think that great good may arise from pushing further our inquiries into this subject, and ascertaining how far legislation already passed has succeeded in this respect, and whether it is not possible, by bringing to our aid the credit of the Local Authorities, especially in congested districts, to push the process a little further, and to make greater strides towards bringing the tenure of land in Ireland into a healthy condition. I do not believe that any tinkering with the land system will have the slightest effect until we can get rid of the duality of ownership which the Land Act of 1881 introduced. I believe, as a consequence of that, in the opinions which many have expressed in this House, that in the peculiar circumstances of Ireland the multiplication of freeholders will be a blessing and security for all who live in that country, and a solution of all the political questions with which we have had lately to deal, to an extent which must make us anxious to push forward every means of bringing such an improved state of things into existence, and which can only be limited by the financial difficulties which undoubtedly exist. It is for the purpose of throwing light upon that question of financial difficulty, and aiding us in removing the obstacles to this much wished for and necessary reform, that we shall appoint this Commission. From this statement, my Lords, it will appear that I am not at present prepared to indicate any legislative policy—that, as far as legislation goes, our action is one of examination and inquiry, and, as far as executive administrative acts are concerned, we have already done our best to enforce the law. We intend to continue in that path, to restore social order, secure all existing rights, and to give back to Ireland the repose which she needs. I will only further say that in all the efforts we shall make in this direction we shall consider ourselves strictly limited, and shall take care that all our legislation is inspired by the decision—the great and critical decision—of the constituencies upon the great issue that has been submitted to them. We exist as a Ministry to maintain the Union. The condition of the maintenance of the Union is the restoration of social order, and to the path so traced we shall unswervingly adhere.

ELECTIONS.

Resolved, That no Peer of the Realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve, for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the Election of any Member to serve in Parliament.

MOTION.

 PARLIAMENT — SESSIONAL ORDERS — INTERFERENCE OF PEERS IN ELECTIONS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom, for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the Election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such Elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a Candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his Commission, to influence the Election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament."

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I venture to ask the House not to assent to the renewal of the last of the Sessional Orders which you, Sir, have just read to the House; and I ask them not to assent to it on this ground—that the Sessional Order has been disobeyed and infringed without regard to Party; that it has been disregarded and infringed by Peers of both Parties for the last 40 or 50 years. In various cases, when such infringement has been brought before the House, I think I shall be able to show that the House has practically said either that it was powerless to enforce its own Resolution, or that it did not think it wise to endeavour to give force to it. Now, Sir, I submit respectfully to the House that it is beneath its dignity to continue to renew a Form which is no longer practically applicable to the political circumstances of this country. I know of no reason why a Peer, so far as the political strife of this country is concerned, should be placed in any inferior position to any other citizen in the State; and I propose to show, very briefly, that at the last Election this Sessional Order was absolutely disobeyed and wilfully disobeyed—that is to say, that the Peers who have disobeyed it, by the language they used, showed that they clearly knew of the existence of the Sessional Order, and clearly knew that they were disobeying it. I shall, further, be able to show the House that since some notice has been taken by the Press that the matter was likely to be considered by this House to-day one of the Peers to whom I refer has intimated that whatever may be the decision of this House—I am not using his own words, but I am stating the sense of what he says—namely, that whatever the decision of this House may be he shall continue to act as he has hitherto done. Allow me, Sir, to enumerate the instances in which the infringement I complain of has occurred. In the first place, the Sessional Order has been disobeyed by Peers who have presided at election meetings after the issue of the Writ. Perhaps I may be permitted to say, once for all, that the infringement of the Sessional Order might be complained of whether it occurred before or after the issue of the Writ; but I am content to confine myself to cases which have occurred after the issue of the Writ. I have no wish to weary the House with the details of many cases; but I desire to point out that Peers have spoken at election meetings in favour of particular candidates; that they have signed circulars delivered to voters after the issue of the Writ—the circulars being dated before the issue—urging upon the voters to vote for particular candidates. In some cases Peers have called upon and canvassed voters to vote for particular candidates; in other cases they have written letters in the nature of semi-private letters in order to influence the voters in favour of a particular candidate. They have further infringed the Sessional Order by lending their carriages and servants to convey voters to the poll. The instances of infringement in the last case are so numerous that they must be within the knowledge of every Member of the House, no matter on which side he happens to sit, and therefore I will not specify the particular instances. The first case which I desire to mention is that of the Earl of Sandwich, who, in South Huntingdonshire, attended election meetings, and spoke on behalf of one of the candidates. Since the Election there was a rejoicing demonstration at his seat, Hinchingsbrooke Park, at which the noble Earl used this language—

“In spite of Mr. Bradlaugh, I venture to assert that I, as an Englishman, have a right to have a deep feeling as to how the country is to be governed. In spite, then, of the Motion which Mr. Bradlaugh proposes to bring before the House of Commons, when I find that a despotic Minister is endeavouring, contrary to the views of all his late and trusted friends, to ruin the country, I shall do my duty in striving for what I consider to be the welfare of the Empire.”

This noble Earl claims that he is entitled to mix in the election of Members of the House of Commons, and to determine who shall be the Minister chosen by the vote of a majority of this House by contributing either to send Members in or to keep them out. Another case is that of the Duke of Hamilton, and I believe this is not his first experience in connection with Parliamentary Elections. At the last Election he worked very hard in Buteshire. On a previous occasion I am informed that he devoted the whole of one day to the performance of the duty of an extra poll clerk outside a polling station, where he kept a list of the voters as they went in. Unfortunately, this taking notice of the voters as they went in to poll was not so harmless a matter as it may appear, but many of the voters were his Grace's tenants, and they were not uninfluenced by his presence, because there was a conviction among them, whether rightly or wrongly, that their livelihood depended more or less upon his Grace's favour; and if the House thinks fit to decide against me in this question, I certainly think it will be its duty to make this case a matter of Privilege which ought to be inquired into, in order to ascertain how far the election in Buteshire was influenced by the conduct of his Grace the Duke of Hamilton. The next case is that of the Duke of Argyll, who has written letters to the newspapers in connection with the elections for Argyllshire and the borough of Inverness. One letter was written by his Grace to the officials taking part in the election with the view of influencing electors as to the way in which they ought to vote. The Earl of Leicester attended more than one meeting, and spoke against the candidature of the hon. Gentleman who was returned for the Freebridge Division of Norfolk in the last Parliament (Mr. Joseph Arch). The noble Earl went into the election with all the vigour and enthusiasm of a man who might have been desirous of winning a seat for himself. I am not blaming the noble Earl for that at all. I do not think that what we allow to a coal-heaver in this country, and to almost every ordinary worker in every class of life, although we refuse it to a policeman, we should deny to any nobleman, and it is for that reason I ask the House not to assent to this Sessional Order. I find that Earl Cowper presided after the issue of the Writ at a meeting in favour of the candidature of the noble Viscount who is now Member for the Biggleswade Division of Bedfordshire (Viscount Baring). Lord Wantage took an active part in the North Berkshire Election against the candidature of a particular gentleman. The Duke of Norfolk attended numerous meetings in South Islington and in Penryn and Falmouth, at some of which he acted as Chairman. Lord Bramwell and Viscount Sherbrooke signed a circular to the electors of Chelsea, a copy of which I hold in my hand. The bulk of these circulars, if not the whole of them, were delivered after the Writ was received by the Returning Officer; and in the circular itself the electors—Liberal, Radical, and Conservative—are called upon to vote for a Gentleman who is now a Member of this House. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; it is because I think that noble Lords should have that opportunity; because I think it is a farce for this House to say that they shall not have it, and then for noble Lords to reply that they will have it, that I now ask the House not to stultify itself by adopting this Sessional Order. The Earl of Northbrook personally called upon and canvassed voters in North Bedfordshire. I have already told the House that I should give instances altogether without regard to political Parties. I find that the Marquess of Ripon introduced candidates at Oldham; that the Earl of Jersey attended a meeting in the Banbury Division of Oxfordshire, and then there is a somewhat curious case in connection with Lord Belper. Lord Belper seems to have thought that after the Writ was issued he had no right to interfere, and he wrote a letter to the election agent of one of the candidates stating that as the

Mr. Bradlaugh

Writ had been issued he could not interfere; but he hoped that all the electors would vote for Mr. Charles Seely. I do not propose to trespass upon the attention of the House with any other instances; but I have no doubt that the cases I have enumerated may be supplemented by many others. [Cries of "Wolverton."] I have only submitted cases which I have been able to verify. There are a large number which I have not been able to verify; but I shall be very happy to receive further evidence from the other side of the House after I have concluded my remarks. The matter is one which has been discussed over and over again in previous Parliaments; but I believe that only one decision has been come to. I only propose to trouble the House with two instances in which the matter was discussed. The last occasion was on the 23rd of February, 1880, when Mr. A. M. Sullivan, who was then a Member of the House, moved that the conduct of Earl Cadogan was a Breach of Privilege. The Previous Question was then moved by the right hon. Gentleman who is now Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) on the ground—

"That these Motions of Breach of Privilege apply to matters which you cannot restrain," and the House carried the Previous Question. The right hon. Gentleman, on a previous occasion, which occurred a short time before, took the same course, and the House endorsed it by a large vote. In 1817 another case was fully discussed in this House, and a large number of precedents were collected by the learned Attorney General for the time being—Sir John Jervis—who quoted, among other instances, the case of Earl Cawdor, when the Member who had raised it had taunted the House of Commons with the inutility of barking where they could not bite. On that occasion, also, the House decided not to take any action. Sir John Jervis cited about 20 cases which had been before the House, all of which ended in nothing. Then I would ask whether the House ought to renew a Sessional Order which has always been utterly disregarded, and which in the late General Election was treated as naught? I would ask if it is consistent with the dignity of the House to keep repeating a form of words to which it gives no effect whatever? The whole of the precedents were collected by the late Sir Erskine May, and will be found on pages 719 and 720 of his very valuable book. If the House is now prepared to renew the Sessional Order, is it prepared to enforce it? I believe I have furnished evidence to the House to show that the Sessional Order is now disregarded and infringed. Is the House prepared to take proceedings in the matter? Is it prepared to summon any one of the Peers I have mentioned to attend at the Bar of the House? Is it prepared to bring itself in conflict with the other House in the event of a Peer neglecting to obey its Order? If not, the whole thing is a farce, and I would ask the Liberal and Radical Members who sit on this side of the House, for I make sure that hon. Gentlemen on the other side, who have volunteered already to supply me with additional evidence, will vote with me—I ask my Liberal Friends on this side to consider whether it is not better to say that this Sessional Order should not be renewed than to renew it and then to allow the Peers to do what they please? Personally, I see no reason why the Peers should not do what they please. I think it would be far better for the Peers to do what they please openly and fairly in this country than for this House to say they have no right, and then to shut its eyes and ears when the Peers treat their Order as if it were a mere farce. I would not ask the House to abandon any of its old Forms if it showed any disposition to enforce them; but it shows no disposition to enforce them; and I maintain that it is unworthy of the House to continue to pass this Order. If the Government—the powerful Government now in Office, so ably led, as I have no doubt it will be when the occasion arises—if the House, so ably led, pledges itself to enforce this Sessional Order, then, as a mere private Member, I have nothing more to say. I shall object to the renewal of the Sessional Order, and if the Sessional Order be renewed I think I am speaking within the Rules of the House when I say that every one of the cases I have mentioned may be brought before the House as a Breach of Privilege. I submit that each case ought to be brought before the House as a case of Breach of Privilege; and if each of these cases only takes some two or three hours to discuss, I will ask Members of the Government, who may have some concern for the disposal of the time of the House, whether they intend to have those cases investigated? If they say no—that they intend to renew the Sessional Order, but do not intend to enforce it—if they say that, then I maintain that they have no right to renew the Order, and I will take the liberty of asking the House to divide against it. Surely the most dignified course will be for the House not to repeat a form of words which has no longer any real meaning, and to which they are not prepared to give effect. I hope the House will declare that it will be no party to the putting of a sham upon its Order Book, which it has neither the will nor the intention to enforce.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not be put to the trouble of a division, because the prospect which has been held out by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) is a very appalling one. We are not likely to have too much time for getting through the regular Business of the House; and if our time is to be occupied in going through all these cases of the conduct of impenitent Peers, I think the Session will be likely to go on much longer than we wish. I beg leave, however, to second the Motion of the hon. Member; but I do not wish to waste the time of the House in doing so, because we are all anxious to hear—as, no doubt, we shall very shortly—a statement as to what the policy of the new Government is. I second the Motion on the ground of justice. I belong to a Society for the abolition of the House of Lords; but I wish to do justice to all Her Majesty's subjects, even the very meanest of them; and I think that, under the present Sessional Order which you, Sir, have read out from the Chair, a certain injustice is done to Peers of the Realm. In what position do they now stand? They are in the House of Lords, and they are strictly prohibited by the Constitution from taking any part in taxation. They are, however, very large taxpayers, and as they are not allowed to vote for those who have to control the taxation of the country, theirs is, consequently, a case of taxation without representation, and on that ground I feel sure I shall get the support of hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side, for it is on account of their determination not to dissociate representation from taxation that they defeated the late Prime Minister, and that they are now sitting on that side of the House. My other reason for opposing this Sessional Order is that the whole thing is a sham. We pass a solemn Rule in this House, and we know perfectly well that we are not going to enforce it. My opinion is that, both in the country and in this House, there are quite enough organized hypocrisies, without adding another.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): There is one feature about this Motion which the whole House will agree is very pleasant and very agreeable, and that is that it has given to the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cockermouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) an opportunity of reminding the House that the House is once more enlivened by his genial presence and his shrewd humour and wisdom. No one, I think, on this side of the House, at any rate, is prepared to feel anything but satisfaction at the presence again of the hon. Baronet. There was one remark which fell from the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), which I hardly think he intended to apply as a threat, because it was a remark which would, I think, be likely to indispose a great many Members of the House from supporting his Motion. I am certain I am speaking correctly when I say it was of a character to prejudice the Motion itself. If I understand the hon. Member for Northampton aright, he intimated that, in case the House did not entirely and immediately agree with the views he had expressed in regard to the Sessional Order, he would deem it his duty to obstruct the proceedings of the House night after night. [Mr. BRADLAUGH: No!] I understood that to be the meaning of the hon. Member, and I am bound to take notice of it.

MR. BRADLAUGH: If my language conveyed that impression, it was not the language I intended to use.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Then I will apologize for putting a wrong construction on the language of the hon. Member. It certainly occurred to me and my Colleagues that that interpretation might be placed on the hon. Member's remarks. The hon. Member contends that this Sessional Order has been disobeyed. I wish that the argument on that point could be left to the dialectic skill of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition; because obviously the whole question, whether the Order is disobeyed or not, turns on the meaning which the House is disposed to put on the expression that no Peer shall "concern" himself with the election of any Member. You may put on that expression a very narrow meaning or a very broad meaning. It might almost be limited to the Resolution of the House that no Peer should vote in any election, or should take any active part in the holding of an election. On the other hand, you might put so broad a construction upon it that no Peer would be allowed to express his opinion on public affairs except in the House of Lords. I myself should be inclined to put a narrow meaning upon that word "concerning." I am disposed to think that there is some value about this Sessional Order, which the House will do well not to abandon hastily. I cannot help noticing that the hon. Member himself adduced a singular instance of the moral restraint which it does exercise on Peers, because he quoted the case of Lord Belper, who wrote a public letter to the effect that on account of this Order he could not in any way interfere with a certain election. But in order not to weary the House I would suggest what is the view which the Government take of this Order. I think that the proposal of the hon. Member is somewhat too rough and ready, though I admit that there is a great deal that is sound and weighty in what fell from him. I think it is not, perhaps, advisable that the House of Commons should preserve Forms which may be proved to be what he has called "shams." But the great thing is to be absolutely certain, before we part with any of these old Forms, that they are shams. Upon that point I cannot help thinking that the view I have expressed will be supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite—namely, that the House of Commons should be very careful and cautious in dealing with these old Forms; and that such a rough and ready course as is proposed by the hon. Member is not necessarily the wisest course which this House could take. There is no doubt that the form of the Order is antiquated, and that it was intended to apply to a state of circumstances which has to a considerable extent become obsolete. The hon. Member proposes that the House should decide between these two alternatives; whether we shall try to enforce the Order rigidly, or altogether abandon it. I would suggest to the hon. Member that there is a third course, and I would support that course by this further suggestion—that whatever the House of Commons does in the matter, it would be well if it could be done unanimously by the entire sense of the whole House of Commons. Therefore, the third course is, in opposition to rigid enforcement or total repeal, that we should appoint a Committee to examine—[A laugh]—I believe that course is strictly in accordance with former precedents when questions of this kind have been raised. There used to be a Committee called "the Committee of Privileges" which has now ceased to be nominated. But I am of opinion that it would not be unwise to allow the Sessional Order to remain for the present, and that in consequence of the remarks which have been made by the hon. Member, and of the views of those who agree with him, we should early next Session appoint a Committee analogous to the Committee of Privileges to examine carefully the effect of this Order, and to decide whether it has any effect at all, and whether it would be wise in any way to revise or modify the Order to meet the altered circumstances of the times. That is the course which I respectfully suggest to the House should be taken with regard to the Sessional Order and the Motion of the hon. Member. I think that no controversy ought to arise on a matter of this kind. I am only pleading that on account of my attachment to the old Forms of the House we should proceed with caution and care, and I trust that the hon. Member will not feel discontented or dissatisfied with the suggestion I have made to him.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I venture to hope that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) will not accept the suggestion of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Lord proposes a Committee of Inquiry. I must remark upon that that it is somewhat singular and significant that a Committee of Inquiry should be proposed at this very early date as the means of meeting difficult questions. I wish also to make a remark upon another observation which fell from the noble Lord. The noble Lord attributed to the hon. Member for Northampton a desire to obstruct the proceedings of the House. But I hope that my hon. Friend will not, in that respect, follow the bad example of the Fourth Party, now happily deceased. If my hon. Friend were to imitate the proceedings of that Party, I am afraid he would lay himself open to the charge of the noble Lord. The noble Lord, no doubt, entirely disapproves now of the proceedings and strategy of the Fourth Party. Another reason why I object to the proposal of the noble Lord to postpone any action upon this question is that the elections are fresh in our memories; and the sooner we bring the Government face to face with their actions and pledges during the elections, the better opportunity there will be of making them stand by those acts and pledges. I am rather afraid that if we leave any matter over for three or four months the Government will forget their pledges, and when hon. Members return they will be alarmed to find the enormous chasm that exists between their pledges at election time and their performances. The General Election has just taken place, and the acts of the noble Lord and of his Party are fresh in our memories. Let us then proceed with the matter now, and not put it off until the time when the noble Lord will be able to say that all these things are ancient history. All I say is that the sooner we act in the matter the better. I hope my hon. Friend will go to a division at once, if only to show how far hon. Members sitting on the Opposition Benches are prepared to support the Government in shelving disagreeable questions.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Mid Lothian: I think everyone must feel—and it was frankly admitted by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that there is very great force in many of the considerations that have been raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) in favour of the abolition of this Sessional Order. It is not easy to make a case in argument for maintaining what purports to be a law—which law we have no disposition to enforce strictly—which probably we have not the power to enforce strictly, and which is, undoubtedly, to a very considerable extent, either neglected or absolutely trodden under foot. At the same time, these are considerations which ought to be brought before the House in connection with the subject. Does the House think that, with the present constitution of Parliament, and with the great powers and privileges attaching to Peers, as an order, which gives them complete control over the legislation of this House—does the House think that it is desirable to encourage persons who are invested with these remarkable privileges to increase a practice which undoubtedly, to some extent, prevails of interference in popular elections? I think, Sir, I have made candid admissions to the hon. Member for Northampton; and I think he will, on his part, admit that the abolition of the Sessional Order would, to a certain extent, be interpreted in the country as an entire withdrawal by the House of Commons of all expressions of disapprobation against the interference of the Lords in popular elections, and would almost act altogether as an expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons that Peers ought so to interfere. Therefore, Sir, I think undoubtedly that if we are of opinion that the renewal of the Sessional Order, or a non-renewal of the Sessional Order, would have the effect of increasing this practice of interference, we cannot avoid looking at the question and forming our own judgment upon it, whether it is desirable to encourage and to bring about an increase of interference of that kind. Then, Sir, there is another view of the case. Although it is entirely inadmissible in this House to impute motives to hon. Members, yet I think we may impute reasons; and, looking to the fact that my hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—whom I congratulate heartily on his return to this House, as I congratulate the House in respect of it—who seconded the Motion, distinctly admitted that he did so because he was prepared to support the abolition of the House of Lords, it appears to me that the abolition of the Sessional Order and the broad adoption of the principle that Peers may be equally concerned in popular elections with Commoners, is in the nature of laying the first parallel in that siege which is, at some time or in some circumstances, to be laid against the House of Lords and its present exclusive Privileges. That is a question on which, at the present moment, I do not give any opinion beyond this. Anything that has to be done in that matter ought to be done by us with our eyes open, and with a view of the purposes to which it is really intended to be directed, and not as a matter of mere form, as if it were of little importance. My position, Sir, is this—that in a case of this kind we ought to pay considerable deference to the views of the Executive Government. The Executive Government has long been, and I think is becoming more and more, from the necessities of the case, a sort of constituted guardian of the Privileges of this House; and any opinion given by them in a case of difficulty ought, therefore, to receive considerable attention from the House, and starts with a certain presumption in its favour. If it is the opinion of the Government that it would not be wise to abolish the Sessional Order by a vote of the House, I myself should be inclined to vote with them on that question. But I must notice slightly the proposal of the noble Lord, which is that the consideration of the subject for that purpose should be referred to a Committee. Now, Sir, I find the House is still in the regular practice of voting that a Committee of Privileges shall be appointed; but of late years it has not been usual to nominate the Committee of Privileges. But, inasmuch as it is quite plain that the House so far supports the noble Lord as to consider its Privileges to be a fit subject to refer to such a Committee by passing a Sessional Order to that effect—that being so, I am inclined to think it would be the wiser, and simpler, and more natural course to allow this question to be referred to that Committee, and that we should proceed to appoint and to nominate persons to serve on the Committee for this purpose. I can quite understand why questions of general interest cannot be conveniently or fitly entertained in a Session of this kind; but the subject we are now discussing assumes the nature of a preliminary condition. Looking at the action of the House, and recollecting the general practice, I would say that if there is to be a Reference to a Committee, the Reference had better be to the Committee which the House of Commons already, in principle, adopts, although recently there may not have been occasion to nominate Members to serve upon it. Whatever view the Government may take of that suggestion, my disposition is to accept the authority of the Government with regard to our vote on the Motion made by the hon. Member for Northampton—the question obviously being one of difficulty. In theory there is undoubtedly a strong case against the Sessional Order; but, on the other hand, it appears not altogether irrational to suppose that the abolition of it might be followed by an increase of a practice which many of us may not be inclined to approve. For my own part, I confess that, although I do not think it very desirable to encourage the practice, it is quite evident that some limitation is imposed by the Sessional Order on the action of Peers. I may state that a number of noble Lords with whom I am acquainted did on principle, if I may say so, very strictly observe that Order. Among them was my noble Friend Lord Wolverton, who had undoubtedly been acting in various matters bearing upon the elections at an earlier period, but who, however, only humbly imitated the practice very much more largely followed by Gentlemen on the other side. I do not wish to dwell on that matter. I only say this to show that there is a certain amount of effect produced by this Sessional Order, and that it must not be considered as one that is altogether shadowy and unsubstantial. If the matter is pressed to a division, I shall vote with the Government against the abolition of the Order.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I would venture to say, Sir, that the reasons which the right hon. Gentleman have given for opposing the Motion are the very reasons why we who support it desire that it should be passed. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that if the Motion is passed it will be regarded in the country as an encouragement to Peers to concern themselves in elections. That is one of the very things which the supporters of the Motion want to bring about. The right hon. Gentleman also said that it bears another aspect, and that the state of things resulting from the abolition of the Sessional Order would be used as a first means of attack against the hereditary character of the House of Lords. Well, that also is one of the things which we had in view in bringing the Motion forward. There is one consideration I should like to put before the House before I sit down. I want hon. Members to consider how this question has been dealt with by the House in past times. In connection with the West Gloucestershire Election in 1847, the Attorney General of that day, Sir John Jervis, laid before the House the whole of the precedents bearing upon this Sessional Order, and what was the result? This Sessional Order was 200 years old, and it had never been effectively enforced except in one case, in which a Bishop was the delinquent. All that happened to the Bishop was that he was deprived of some minor office which he filled in connection with the Court. That was the only case in which the Sessional Order was put in force. In 1780 the Duke of Chandos was charged with having infringed the Order, and, after the fashion suggested by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the case. The Committee found the Duke of Chandos guilty; but the House declined to interfere. In the same year a charge was made against the Duke of Bolton of undue interference; but the House, being better informed than it was in the previous case, took no notice of the matter. In 1840 a similar charge was preferred against Lord Cawdor, and again the House refused to take notice of it, being convinced that it was perfectly useless to bark where they dared not bite. For a considerable number of years the House of Commons has been barking without attempting to bite. Perhaps it will not surprise the House to hear that among the Peers who from time to time have been charged with infringing this Order two of the most conspicuous have borne the titles of Duke of Marlborough and Marquess of Salisbury. In the year 1845 the Duke of Marlborough was charged with disobeying the Order four times in 18 months, in promoting the election of members of his own family in the borough of Woodstock. That borough, I believe, has now disappeared, and with its extinction has disappeared the chance of any future Duke of Marlborough repeating the offence. In 1880 this Sessional Order was again brought before the House, when the House, under the lead of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) distinctly pronounced it imprudent, impracticable, and impossible to enforce the Order. That being the view of the House, I hope it will no longer continue to stultify itself, but that, by saying "No" to this Sessional Order, it will declare that it no longer intends to keep upon its Books an Order which it has neither the courage nor the will to enforce.

The House divided :—Ayes 294; Noes 126: Majority 168.—(Div. List, No. 1.)

Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the Election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such Elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a Candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his Commission, to influence the Election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been elected or returned a Member of this House, or endeavoured so to be, by Bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such Bribery or other corrupt practices.

WITNESSES.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any Witness, in respect of his evidence to be given to this House, or any Committee thereof, or directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanor: and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall, or in the passages leading to this House, during the sitting of Parliament, and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts; and that the Serjeant at Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Ordered, That the Votes and Proceedings of this House be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker, and that he do appoint the printing thereof, and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same.

PRIVILEGES.

Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed.

OUTLAWRIES BILL.

Bill "for the more effectual preventing of Clandestine Outlawries," read the first time; to be read a second time.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): It may be to the convenience of the House that I should give Notice now that after the conclusion of the debate on the Address I will move—

"That the Committee of Supply and Ways and Means, and all stages of the Appropriation Bill, have precedence of other Orders of the Day and the Notices of Motions on every day on which they may be appointed.

"That the Standing Order, No. 21, relating to Notices on going into Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday be extended to the other days of the week."

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DURATION OF THE SESSION

Mr. PARNELL Cork: In view of the Notice given by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think it will be most convenient for many hon. Members to know whether the Government have really made up their minds as to whether it is their intention to prorogue Parliament as soon as the Financial Business has been concluded?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL)

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST.

Mr. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland two Questions, of which I have given him private Notice, with respect to the condition of social order in Belfast. The first is, What are the intentions of the Government with regard to a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Catholics of Belfast on the 16th instant, protesting against the proposal to withdraw the extra police force from that town, and to substitute stipendiary magistrates for the ordinary justices, on the ground that the adoption of these suggestions would be disastrous to the peace of the town and would endanger the lives of the people? The second Question is, Who are to be the additional Members whom the Government intend to appoint on the Royal Commission of Inquiry in regard to the Belfast riots?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I was not aware that Questions would be asked to-day, and I did not receive Notice of the first Question of the hon. Member at all. If he will put it down upon the Paper, I will endeavour to answer it another day; but I rather gather that it relates to a condition of things in Belfast that is past. With regard to the second Question, I may say our intention is to strengthen the Commission appointed by the late Government, and to extend the scope of its inquiry. We do not intend to substitute a Royal Commission for the Commission of the Lord Lieutenant, for the simple reason that no additional powers would be given by the change. We are considering in what way the full and searching inquiry which everybody desires can best be secured, and with regard to that matter whether it would be well for us to apply to Parliament for power to be given to the Commissioners to take evidence upon oath. The House is aware that, without Parliamentary sanction, that power cannot be conferred upon the Commissioners.

Mr. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to be able to give the names of the additional Commissioners to-morrow?

loyalty of Irishmen, often to a falling cause and to their own ruin, is a matter of history; and I would ask hon. Members where would be the record of our history if the valour, bravery, loyalty, and devotion of Irish soldiers were expunged from it? Even during the late troublous times the loyalty and devotion of the Royal Irish Constabulary, a body recruited from the midst of the Irish people, has been beyond all praise. [An hon. MEMBER: Belfast!] An hon. Member says "Belfast." I will not allude to Belfast, because we have been told that a Commission with great powers is immediately to be issued, and also because I have reason to believe that the question of Belfast will be brought before the House by an Amendment to the Address. But I am glad that a searching investigation will take place, and I rejoice to hear that the Commission will have power to take evidence on oath. I will not also allude to the terrible state of the Southern counties of Ireland—such counties as Cork, Kerry, and Clare—because I believe that it has been brought about by circumstances which are only present and passing—circumstances which, I believe, a Government at once firm and willing to act would find no great difficulty in controlling. I look forward to a time, not far distant, when Ireland, under a firm and just Government, will be as prosperous and, for its own interests and welfare, as attached to the Union as any portion of Her Majesty's Dominions. Sir, in my opinion, the agrarian difficulty is at the root of the Irish Question, and that difficulty will be greatly met by an extension of peasant proprietorships. But, to attain this, confidence must be restored in Ireland, crime must be punished, and honest men must be allowed to reap the reward of their industry. The influx of capital, at present driven from Ireland by crime and violence, must be encouraged and brought back; persons must be made to feel that they are secure in the investments they make, that crime and outrage must be punished; and if coercion, so called, be required, it will not be used to coerce honest and law-abiding citizens, but to protect them from coercion bred in a foreign country, and followed up by an agitation which crushes out the life-blood of the people. The country will then become prosperous. Sir, I have dwelt thus much upon Ireland, because I believe that upon the conduct of their Irish policy depends, not only the stability of the Government, but also the welfare and almost the existence of the British Empire. I have spoken, Sir, as briefly as I could; but I have spoken in singleness of heart, with a true love of my country, and with true loyalty and devotion to the British Empire. I trust that I have spoken no word which can give offence. I thank the House for the indulgence with which it has listened to me, and I beg to move that the humble Address of which I have given Notice be presented to Her Majesty as an answer to Her Most Gracious Speech from the Throne.

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech which Her Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty has summoned us to meet at this unusual season of the year for the transaction of indispensable business:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Session of the last Parliament was interrupted before the ordinary work of the year had been completed, in order that the senses of Her Majesty's people might be taken on certain important proposals with regard to the Government of Ireland, and that the result of that appeal has been to confirm the conclusion to which the late Parliament had come:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the provisional nature of the arrangement which was made by the last Parliament for the public charge of the year renders it inexpedient to postpone any further the consideration of the necessary financial legislation:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Estimates which were submitted to the last Parliament, and were only partially voted, will be laid before us:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that, at a period of the year usually assigned for the Recess, and after the prolonged and exceptional labours to which many of us have been subjected, Her Majesty abstains from recommending now, for our consideration, any Measures except those which are essential to the conduct of the Public Service during the remaining portion of the financial year:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that such Measures shall receive our prompt and careful attention."

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): Sir, on rising to second the Address which has been moved by my right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel King-Harman) I feel myself placed in a condition of some embarrassment, which causes me to make a special claim upon the indulgence of the House. On similar occasions I have noticed that it is usual for hon. Members who discharge this honourable duty to speak upon almost any and every topic—they "survey mankind from China to Peru;" they discuss all manner of questions, whether relating to home, or foreign, or Imperial policy, in which Englishmen can possibly be concerned. But on this occasion my range of observation is necessarily restricted by the severely business-like character of the Speech from the Throne. I think it would be impossible to imagine any Speech more directly to the point, or one which stated the cause for which Parliament is called together with more admirable brevity and clearness. The Government are evidently of opinion that, although technically this is the first Session of a new Parliament, yet, in reality, we have only met here to continue and complete the work begun in the Session of the short Parliament of 1885. The correctness of that view is guaranteed by the language used in the Speech from the Throne before the Dissolution of the last Parliament, because at that time Her Majesty told us that she released us from our labours before the completion of the regular work of the Session in order that the opinion of the nation might be taken on the Irish policy of the late Government. We have now come together to complete that necessary work. We all know that the financial business of the country is greatly in arrear. Votes on Account have been taken which might have enabled the Government to delay the meeting of Parliament till October; but I believe Her Majesty's Advisers have thought it more compatible with the situation, and more straightforward towards the new Parliament, to call it together at once, in order that those Votes which have been reserved for discussion, and particularly the Irish Votes, might be submitted forthwith to the House, and that Irish Members might have a Constitutional opportunity of giving their opinion on the voting of money for carrying on the government of Ireland in its present form. Sir, I feel convinced that the country is thoroughly in accord with Her Majesty's Ministers as to the propriety of the course they are now taking. To judge from the language used in the newspapers, and from the Ministerial elections which have taken place—Lord Salisbury explained, at the meeting at the Carlton Club, the reasons which induced him to call Parliament together—from all these sources we learn that the country is desirous of a period of rest. And this is only natural, because both Members and constituencies have been engaged for 12 months in incessant political agitation. We have felt the severe strain of the work, and especially those who have had to go through two contested elections; and it is natural that we should now have an interval of repose, in which to recruit our exhausted energies, to recover our tempers, to find a variety of occupations and amusements for our jaded minds and bodies, and thus to lay up for ourselves a fresh store of health and strength for the Parliamentary campaign, which will be arduous enough next year.

I have tried to think from what quarter of the House objection might be taken to the moderate programme set before us by Her Majesty's Government. I turn to the Benches occupied by the followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). We have heard a great deal during the last few days of the sentiments of that hon. Member and his supporters with regard to the present situation of affairs, and I see that one of the best known of his followers has spoken in a most enthusiastic way of the great moral victory which his Party has lately achieved. Sir, it is always a great consolation for men who have suffered a great material defeat to say that they have won a great moral victory; but it is satisfactory to hear from the speeches made in that quarter that the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Friends are of opinion that, by pursuing the course of Constitutional agitation in which they are engaged, under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), they may very soon succeed in attaining their ends. I see that one of those hon. Members believes that Home Rule will be granted to Ireland with the goodwill of the English people within the limits of one year. [Cheers.] Hon. Members cheer that statement. It may be right or wrong; but, if that is their opinion, it absolutely precludes them from having recourse to a policy of defiance and exasperation, and compels them to continue in accord with popular sentiment in this country, and to give such facilities as they can for the carrying on of the ordinary and indispensable business of the country in the proper way.

Now, Sir, we have not had an opportunity—we shall have the opportunity during the debate—of knowing what is the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian upon the programme of the Government; but we have heard a good deal lately from the hon. Member who puts himself forward as the spokesman of the sadly diminished following of the right hon. Gentleman; we have heard from the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) much about what he thinks should be done in order to assert the vigour and policy of the Liberal Party. The scheme of that hon. Gentleman appears to be this—civilly to bow out of the Liberal Party everybody who does not agree with him. It is perfectly natural that we, on our part, should not be disposed to baulk this inclination; on the contrary, the Government would, I believe, readily grant, at ordinary times, every facility for carrying out such a design. But I will put it to the hon. Member that, in the interval of a few months, he may be enabled so to perfect his plan as to carry it out with less risk of the recurrence of that terrible miscarriage which was the result of all his diplomatic efforts to heal the breach in the Liberal Party of the last Parliament. Now I turn to the large Party of Unionist Liberals who follow the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), and remark that we know from their public utterances that they are willing to give a loyal support to the Government in carrying out the programme now put forward.

It only remains for me to say a few words as to the policy of the Conservative Party. We are asked what that policy is. It is not for me to indicate it; it would be presumptuous for me to form a forecast of the speech which the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill), who now occupies his rightful position as Leader of the Tory Party in this House, will no doubt make later on in this debate; but I think his speech might well be a free English rendering of that well known French phrase, J'y suis, j'y reste. The Government are perfectly justified in taking up that position; because what is it that the Unionist Party has lately done? Why, they have repulsed a most dangerous attack upon the citadel of the Constitution. If those who have been thus repulsed wish to renew the attack, well, then, it is for them to make the next move. We have the mandate of the country to justify us in saying that all we have to do is to maintain the Union as it now exists, and to take care that the law is strictly, consistently, and, at the same time, generously administered in all parts of the United Kingdom. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members opposite seem to doubt that we have any mandate of that kind. I say that the verdict given by the constituencies is a splendid vindication of free discussion and popular government. We can all remember the scene in this House—for on whichever side we sit, or whatever misgivings we might have had as to the tendency of his policy, we were accustomed to look to the late Prime Minister as the most illustrious of living Englishmen—when the right hon. Gentleman brought forward his great scheme of Home Rule and placed it before the House. Whether we regard the magnitude of the issue, the reputation of the principal actors in the drama, or the completeness and effectiveness of the stage accessories, I think it will be more memorable in Parliamentary annals than even that pageantry of the impeachment of Warren Hastings in Westminster Hall, which Lord Macaulay has described for us in such glowing colours. The right hon. Gentleman put forth all the energies of his mind, all the resources of his eloquence, to strike the popular imagination; and he appealed more especially to the generous emotions of Englishmen by inviting them to co-operate with him in a great work of justice and humanity. When we think of the magnetic and almost magical influence which he has in raising the enthusiasm of the people, I think we may almost be surprised that he did not carry with him the whole country. But many hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House helped us to make a splendid protest against that policy; those hon. Members did splendid work in educating the public mind; the Irish policy of the late Government was thoroughly discussed and threshed out by the people during the autumn; and the verdict of the people, which I believe to be final and irrevocable, was given. The Home Rule Bill, in my opinion, is dead; I do not think the right hon. Gentleman opposite will attempt to revive it; and if he does not, no meaner spirit is likely to step in to accomplish what he has left undone. I say that the verdict of the constituencies is a signal vindication of the policy which has been adopted by the two great political Parties in this House in the enfranchisement of householders in boroughs and counties during the last 30 years. Many hon. Members used to look with grave misgivings upon those Acts; but we know now, after the great trial to which the Democracy has been exposed, that they possess the same common sense, the same sobriety of judgment, the same patriotism, the same Imperial instinct, the same tenacity of purpose which have always been the distinguishing features in the national character of Englishmen. If I may say one word more about the policy of the Government, I will venture to refer to a statement which the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) made not long ago. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the administrative skill of that right hon. Gentleman, we all admit that he is perfectly unrivalled in the art of coining expressive phrases. I think that his alliterative jingle about "manacles," which now excites so much admiration among the most extreme section of the Irish-American Party across the Atlantic, is a phrase which the right hon. Gentleman must himself regret to have uttered, because it did the grossest injustice to the policy of his opponents. But there is another phrase uttered by him which explains the policy which Her Majesty's Government have now in view. The right hon. Gentleman said he wanted to secure power at Westminster and order in Ireland. Well, that is the aim of Her Majesty's Government also; but they do not wish to secure it by the same means; they do not wish to banish the Irish Members from this House, and thus give an outward and visible sign of the disruption of the United Kingdom. They are quite content to work on either with those hon. Gentlemen or against them, and to make the best of the government of Ireland. They mean to do this—to uphold order in that country; and to take care that the lives, the liberties, and the property of the humblest citizens in Ireland shall be safe, whether it be in Belfast or in Kerry.

Before concluding, I should like to say one word with regard to the notice which appeared in the newspapers—to that in which the hon. Member for the City of Cork invited his followers to be present here to-day, on the ground that the state of public affairs is grave and pressing. Sir, the state of public affairs is always grave and pressing in the case of an Empire which, like England, has such vast and world-wide responsibilities. Not only is the state of public affairs grave and pressing with regard to Ireland; but it is grave and pressing with regard to other matters. Ireland is, no doubt, an interesting country; but, after all, it is not the most important part of the British Empire, and the English people expect Her Majesty's Government to consider other matters, of great importance to themselves—they expect Her Majesty's Government to be able to devote some time to the urgent and pressing questions affecting the trade and commerce of this country.

Then, again, with regard to foreign policy; we know that our rivals and enemies in all parts of the world have shown great activity in recent years, and that it is absolutely necessary that the Government should keep constant watch upon them. I do not think Foreign Governments are likely to have less respect for England, when they find that the Government can devote as much attention to administration as to legislation, and that this "land of settled government" does not require to effect a change in its Constitution every six months.

Finally, there is the great question which has attracted the attention of the English people for some time past, and which Lord Salisbury the other day handled with generous sentiment, and, at the same time, with statesman-like discretion—I mean the question of Imperial Federation. In that question there are, I admit, difficulties which are not dreamed of in the philosophy of after-dinner speeches. Not the least of these difficulties is the consideration that, in the interest of British taxpayers, the power of the sword must never be separated from the power of the purse, and that those who wish to control the Imperial policy of this country must be prepared to bear a fair share of Imperial burdens. But these and other difficulties exist to be overcome by statesmen. For my part, I am disposed to share the hope, expressed, I believe, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in his great speech on the Home Rule Bill, in which he pointed to the possibility of finding the solution of our Irish difficulty in a system of federation; and I think that we might thus, perhaps, to apply the famous words of Canning—"Call in a new world to redress the balance of the old." But, be that as it may, we know that the sentiment of our race throughout the world is now strongly in favour of binding together the Mother Country and its Colonies and Dependencies in a closer and more effective union; and the achievement of such a task would indeed be an Imperial work, and one worthy to engage the attention of English public men. Sir, I have the honour to second the Motion of my right hon. and gallant Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That, &c."—[See page 96.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) said: Sir, I am sure that no one will question either the right of the two hon. Members who have addressed the House to assume the duty which they have discharged, or the ability which they can bring to the discharge of any duty which they may undertake. At the same time, Sir, I cannot help saying that I am glad to say that it forms no part, according to usage or according to the convenience of the office I have now to discharge, to comment in detail upon the speeches in which the Address has been Moved and Seconded. In particular, with regard to the speech of the hon. Member the Seconder (Mr. J. M. Maclean), while I am sincerely indebted to him for the favourable and too flattering remarks with which he was pleased to refer to me personally, I own there were two points that struck me in that speech to which I should like to refer. One phrase I will observe—and which I regret he uttered—because I think it must have fallen from him inadvertently. The hon. Gentleman spoke of "our rivals and enemies in all parts of the world." Well, Sir, I confess, without wishing to take an oversanguine view of the state and relations of civilized nations, I do cherish the hope that we have not at any rate got rivals and enemies in all parts of the world. I followed the hon. Member with great sympathy in that portion of his speech in which he referred to the labours to which we have been subjected, and the state of exhaustion to which we have been reduced. I entirely followed him in that portion of his speech; but then I must confess that I was somewhat surprised when I found that, instead of manifesting this exhaustion, and avoiding topics of controversy, and encouraging brevity of debate, the hon. Member, though he did not "survey mankind from China to Peru," nevertheless undertook, I think, the much more arduous task of stating in full, and as if by authority, the policy of the existing Government, and undoubtedly gave to his remarks, as in a certain degree also did the Mover of the Address, a polemical and provocative character. Well, Sir, my sincere desire and intention and duty on this occasion, is to avoid all subjects that are properly speaking of a controversial character, and in that respect I have perhaps an advantage over the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I have very few remarks to make upon the Speech from the Throne. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address (Colonel King-Harman) began by referring—in terms extremely courteous and considerate as towards the hon. Members on this side of the House—to the foreign policy of the Government. Anything that I have to say upon that subject will be disposed of in a moment or two, and I hope it will not be conceived in a different tone. With regard to Burmah, I express much regret to find circumstances reported from time to time which would appear to indicate that far greater difficulties have been experienced in connection with that country than were anticipated at the time of its annexation. But, Sir, I am well aware that the first Government of Lord Salisbury, in deciding on that act of annexation and announcing it to the world, had questions of an arduous, and difficult, and delicate character to deal with, and undoubtedly I should be very far from taking advantage of anything that has happened for the purpose of justifying an adverse verdict on their conduct until there is information before us of a nature to justify and require such a verdict. With respect to foreign policy generally, I infer from the absence of notice of it in the Speech from the Throne that there is no question at present before the Government of a grave or alarming character; for if there had been such question, no doubt they would have thought it fit and necessary to refer to it. I would go one step further, and say it was with very great satisfaction that, during the first Government of Lord Salisbury, I found myself able to follow not only with acquiescence, but in general with decided approval, the measures which that Nobleman had taken, in the Office of Foreign Secretary, for the defence of the honour and interests of this country, and for the maintenance of the peace of the world. I venture to express the hope, after the intervention of the six months during which we held Office, that the time has perhaps arrived when a great public advantage may be found to have been achieved in the attainment of something like a continuity in the foreign policy of the country, which, undoubtedly, will prove exceedingly conducive to an increase both of our legitimate influence, and to the peace and welfare of the civilized world. The reference to Ireland in the Speech is very brief, and the reference to the Elections is one of which I can make no just complaint. It is perfectly true and undeniable that the verdict of the country, as expressed in the Returns to this House, has tended "to confirm the conclusion to which the late Parliament had come" with respect to the Irish policy of Her Majesty's late Government. The hon. Gentleman obliges me to say a word upon that subject, and one word only it shall be. He expressed his opinion that even I, the ringleader in all the mischief which he thinks has been done, should never again attempt to produce the measures which were introduced on the part of the late Administration into this House. I will go so far towards meeting the hon. Member as to say that certainly, in my opinion, the conduct of the great question connected with the policy of this country towards Ireland is a matter that ought under all circumstances, where it is possible, to remain in the hands and under the primary responsibility of the Government; but if the hon. Gentleman supposes that anything that has happened has produced the slightest change in my convictions with regard to the basis and principle of that policy, I cannot afford him the slightest encouragement or smallest ground for such a supposition. I do not wish to press forward the course of events with undue haste. I hope we shall remember on this side of the House what is due to a Government which has just assumed Office; but I must say that all that has happened, instead of weakening, has confirmed me in the strong belief that we did not err in the main principles of the measures we recommended to this House. It is, perhaps, not now the time for me to anticipate the answer that may be made to the hon. Member's announcement of the irrevocable character of this verdict of the country—it is not now the time or place for me to dwell on a different anticipation; but, so far as my convictions are concerned—and I hope that my actions will ever follow my convictions—I felt it necessary to say the few words I have addressed in answer to his appeal. The retrospect of the Irish Question is, I think, stated in the Speech from the Throne with perfect fairness. I must say a few words as to its prospects; and what I am now going to say as to its prospects in the hands of the existing Government will not, I hope, transgress the line that I have laid down for myself. I do not desire, or intend, or think it to be controversial; but I am aware that it is an unhappy condition of human life occasionally to provoke by paying a compliment, and I am not certain how far the compliment I have to pay will be acceptable to those for whom it is intended. On reading this Speech—I am not referring to what it contains, but to what it does not contain—my first impression is an impression of decided satisfaction. Although we are believed to be at issue, and I fear still at issue, upon principles of some depth and breadth, yet I cannot but bear in mind the position in which we stood six months ago with regard to the principle of what I will not call "coercion," but what I may call "a repressive policy for Ireland," and the very marked difference from the position in which we now stand, and the mitigation which this change appears to me to indicate in the views, intentions, and temper of Her Majesty's Government. It will be borne in mind that, on the 26th January, it was found necessary to announce—and announce in terms of great decision—in this House the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a strong measure of a repressive class, as being absolutely required and called for by the existing condition of affairs in Ireland. Evidently that view of the state of Ireland was not abandoned by the Conservative Government on their retirement from Office, because, on the contrary, reference was made on various occasions to the condition of Ireland, as requiring immediate and strong handling on the part of the Executive. On the 4th of March last, a Motion was made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Dublin University (Mr. Holmes), who represented Ireland in this House at the time, on the part of the Party now in Office, in which he went the extreme length—for it certainly was an extreme length—of saying—"That this House is unwilling to entertain Estimates for the Civil Establishments in Ireland before being placed in possession of the policy which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue for the restoration and maintenance of social order in that country."

At that time we had been five weeks in Office; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to go that length, although he is now one of those who are inviting us to use expedition in voting all the remaining Estimates. The right hon. and learned Gentleman at the time was prepared to refuse Supplies, because, within a period of five weeks from the assumption of Office, we had not produced our measures to the House. I dare say he will have an opportunity of explaining these matters in the course of the debate, and

I do not wish to draw from him a premature explanation. But his action was not a solitary action; it was the action of his Party. The noble Lord who is now the Leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill) then expressed—

"The strong conviction he entertained of the necessity for the suppression of the National League for all the purposes of law and order." And the right hon. Gentleman, then the Leader of the House (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), distinctly affirmed the Motion of the right hon. and learned Member by a short speech, which he made after the division on the Adjournment, in which he described it as a "protest against the betrayal of the country." It certainly was a strong proposition, and I only quote it to show the strength of the convictions with which it was then connected as to the necessity of repressive legislation for Ireland, that non-production of such legislation was declared by the right hon. Gentleman to be a betrayal of the country. Nor was the opinion abandoned for a considerable time after the Motion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; for the most dismal accounts were given by noble Lords, now Members of the Cabinet. On the 2nd of June, in the House of Lords, speaking with reference to the condition of Ireland—to the condition of Ireland as it then stood—Lord Cranbrook, for example, said—

"The people are suffering torture; they are losing property through your neglect; those tenants who are honest men are afraid to pay their rent through your neglect, and the landlords are impoverished."

And Lord Ashbourne, whom I need not quote in detail, speaks in much the same sense. Therefore, we had at that time a very strong conviction announced in this House on the 26th of January, and long afterwards consistently maintained, and strongly urged, involving the necessity of the immediate application of repressive measures to Ireland. Now, I am sorry to say that, so far as we take the test of the diminution of crime, there has been no change which warrants a different view at the present time from the view which might have been taken in January last. The latest Returns that I have is the Return for June and July of agrarian crime compared with the Return for December and January—the two months preceding the present period compared with the two months preceding the notice of a great repressive measure. In December and January, the crimes—apart from threatening letters reported to the Constabulary—were 110; in June and July they were 124; and I am sorry to say that the agrarian crime of the last 12 months in Ireland has, undoubtedly, presented a more serious character than that which had marked it during the two preceding years. It is more serious in this important respect—that, whereas in those two years the crime of agrarian murder had been almost effaced, within the last 12 months the agrarian murders amount, I think, to no less than 10. Now, Sir, do not let it be supposed for a moment that I think there is a state of things in Ireland that justifies the introduction of repressive measures. I think nothing of the kind. But what I wish to observe is this. The persons of great authority now at the head of the largest Party in this House, who felt an overwhelming necessity for repressive measures in January last, and who continued to urge for some months that such measures would be necessary, have now abandoned the opinion, and meet the House without any indication of an intention to introduce them; and, on the contrary, allowing for what the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) has said with regard to a Prorogation, after the close of the discussion on the Estimates, point to the intervention of an interval before any measures or any policy as to the state of Ireland are to be introduced. Now, Sir, in my opinion, in proportion as we move away from the state of readiness to adopt coercion in legislation, we come nearer to the essential, vital, and necessary principles of a sound policy of separate self-government for Ireland. I have therefore to express my satisfaction—not as a matter in any way of reproach—I heartily express my satisfaction that there appears to me to be a greater approach to unity on this important subject of repressive legislation for Ireland—a greater approach to the unity of principle and feeling in this House at present, than existed six months ago. And now, Sir, with respect to the Prorogation of the House, and the interval which possibly may elapse before Her Majesty's Government make their proposals with reference to Ireland. The Seconder of the Address stated indeed that they had nothing to do but to maintain the Union and administer the law. That is a very simple view of the condition of Ireland, because we have been for the last 86 years maintaining the Union, and I do not suppose there is any Party in the House—at least I do not suppose that either of the two Parties which have been connected with the administration of the law of Ireland—will for a moment allow that they have not, at all times, done their best to administer the law. I think that, in that respect, the hon. Gentleman the Seconder of the Address can hardly have embraced the fulness of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I am persuaded that, especially after what I have said with regard to their indisposition to adopt measures of coercion, measures of repression—I am persuaded that Her Majesty's Government take a very different measure of their own duty, and of the necessities of the case. That on which I am now going to offer a remark is simply the question of the time when they will be in a condition to make known to us their general view, and to lay before us such proposals as they may think it their duty to introduce. Sir, a fair time ought to be allowed; but I think the House will feel with me that that time ought not to be unnecessarily prolonged. The Opposition on that subject were, six months ago, extremely rigid. If I remember rightly, it was with the utmost impatience that I could be allowed to beg of the House a period of six weeks, during which six weeks we were in the midst of all the Business of the Session, and not with the leisure of a Recess—during which six weeks we were to undertake the formation of two Bills as complex, perhaps, as almost any Bills that have been laid before the House for a great number of years. Well, I thought we were rather severely, and I believed harshly, pressed at the time, and I do not propose to retaliate; but I do propose to say that it appears to me hardly consistent with political prudence—I do not wish to raise it as a subject of sharp difference of opinion at this time, and I certainly do not think of anything like moving an Amendment to the Address on the subject—but it does appear to me that it would not be consistent with political prudence to contemplate the adjournment of all declaration of Irish policy so long as until the month of February, when Parliament usually meets. There are two considerations which seem to me to support that view of the case, independently of the fact that it can hardly be thought that so long a period is necessary for the consideration of the case, at a time when our minds have all for the last 12 months really, I might almost say, been considering little else. The first of these considerations is that this is a question not of general policy, not of mere legislative improvement, but of social order. Both sides of the House, during the last Session of Parliament, were completely agreed in that view of the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) urged his plea on the ground that the condition of social order in Ireland was most urgent, and required immediate attention. That we never questioned for a moment. The question was between the different modes of dealing with social order in Ireland. We proposed a mode—differently, perhaps, from the majority of the House—which we thought the only certain and effectual mode; but we never questioned that it was a matter of social order which was before us. Well, Sir, the matter of social order is from the very nature of the case a matter of urgency. I remember very well when Sir Robert Peel took Office in 1841, after the rejection of the Whig Government—and I am not sure, Sir, that we did not meet on the very same day of the month of August, 45 years ago, as that on which we are meeting now—after he obtained the residue of Supply he was allowed an interval until February to frame his measures. But his measures were not measures connected with social order. There was no question of social order at issue at all. They were measures entirely of commercial policy. The Corn Law of the year 1846 had become, perhaps, a subject of controversy which might be said indirectly, at least, to involve social order; but in 1841, and for years after, it was a pure question of legislative improvement, with regard to which there was not the smallest argument for deviating from the arrangement of the time with respect to the proceedings of Parliament. I own that it appears to me that it would be a great responsibility—especially as we have seen that whatever urgency there was in the state of Ireland six months ago has not in any manner been abated—it would be a very great responsibility to pass into the winter and through a large portion of the winter before taking this House into the confidence of Her Majesty's Government, and calling attention to this most grave and most absorbing question. There is another consideration which meets me in the same direction, and it is this—I believe, although agrarian crime has not diminished in Ireland, yet I do believe that we have in the general feeling and sentiment of Ireland at this moment a tempered disposition of the public mind, more disposed to discourage everything of the kind than probably has been the case for many, many years past. I should be very sorry if a period so favourable were allowed to pass away. And, Sir, there is that other question to which reference has hardly been made, but which cannot be absent from the mind of anyone who touches Irish matters—namely, the question of the payment of rent. The condition of Ireland with regard to the payment of rent has, I believe, upon the whole, not been for the last 12 months in a very satisfactory condition. I speak of it as relatively to other times, and I speak of it also as relatively to the payment of rent in England and Scotland, where there has been a disposition to pay; but nobody can say on the other side that the state of circumstances has been altogether satisfactory. Well, we approach in November a great and important period for the payment of rents in Ireland. The circumstances of harvest are uncertain. Though a good crop is in the ground, the actual weather prognostications do not allow us to form the most sanguine anticipations—at any rate, the most certainly sanguine anticipations as to what may happen. We know the opinion that prevails in Ireland—that of, at all events, a large portion of the community, in consequence of the changes in agricultural values—that there is a difficulty in maintaining the judicial rents. I am not qualified to give an opinion on that subject for myself, and I give no opinion. What I wish to impress is, that we have at the present moment a season singularly favourably in Ireland for the dealing with any real political exigencies of that country, and that we should lose all our advantage were we to pass into a different state of things with regard to the payment of rents. Were there to be anything like a general resistance or any revival of the doctrines hostile to rent under the influence of the passing circumstances of the moment, an immense addition would be made to the complications of this question, and it is extremely desirable, as it appears to me, to forestal those complications. Now, Sir, I have no intention of raising any issue upon this in the form of an Amendment to the Address. I have no intention of even pressing at the present moment for a declaration from the Government. What I ask from the Government is that they will take fairly into consideration these matters, and will examine carefully the question whether the general considerations do not make it extremely desirable that before the close of the present year they should if they are able to do it, as I imagine they would be able, to place before the House their views of the policy for Ireland and the measures which they may think it proper to bring in. Sir, it appears to me to be a proposition which one may fairly argue without introducing into the debate anything of a polemical character. The issue before the House is extremely grave, and the opinion, I think, of nearly the whole House is agreed on that; and that the Irish Question, whatever view we may take of it, is the question of the hour, and we must endeavour to apply to it some satisfactory solution, or some approach to a solution, which may have the effect of improving the actual position. Independently of its vast importance from other points of view, it is of the utmost possible moment in reference to the object we all most cherish—namely, of placing this House in a position to maintain its efficiency and its dignity, and to address itself to the enormous arrears of legislative duty which the circumstances of late years, and most of all, perhaps, the circumstances of Ireland have tended to impede.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): In endeavouring to reply to the remarks which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and in endeavouring to lay before the House a clear and full statement of the views of Her Majesty's Government in the present conjunction of public affairs, I trust that I may receive, not in any way on my own account, but on account of the importance of the affairs with which I will try to deal, some measure of the patience and indulgence of the House of Commons. I fear it will be necessary for me to trespass, although at an inconvenient hour, for some little length of time; but it will be my object, as far as possible, to condense and to render concise the remarks which it is my duty to make. It is, at any rate, one of the most pleasant privileges of anyone filling the position which I have the honour to hold that, before addressing himself to the more difficult and less pleasant portion of his task, he may, with the general concurrence of the House, as on almost all occasions, offer to the Mover and Seconder of the Address the congratulations of the House on the manner in which they have discharged their duties; and I feel certain that on the present occasion I shall not be in any way transgressing the rights of my position in offering to my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend, the Mover and the Seconder of the Address, the thanks of the Government, and the congratulations of, at any rate, a very large portion of the House who listened to them, on the skill, tact, and ability with which they discharged duties which are always difficult. I do not propose to follow, at any great length, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in the remarks which fell from him, because I fancy that the general statement of the views of the Government which I shall have to make will, to a great extent, answer many of his inquiries and comments. Certainly, we have nothing whatever to complain of, and no severe comments to make on the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has delivered. It certainly was to me an enormous relief to listen to that speech, because, from sources of information which are not naturally always well-informed, we had been led to believe that an onslaught of a more than usually terrible character was to be made upon the Treasury Bench under the Leadership of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman will understand the appalling nature of that apprehension even to the stoutest mind. But that heavy cloud has passed away. In fact, there is nothing which calls for special notice in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with the exception of two or three isolated remarks on matters omitted from the Gracious Speech from the Throne. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the state of affairs in Burmah, and he appeared to imagine that the Government were experiencing greater difficulty in bringing that country into subjection and order than they anticipated when they assumed the responsibility of recommending its annexation. Well, I have been somewhat responsible for recommending the annexation of that country, and I can most truly state to the House that the difficulties experienced have in no degree whatever exceeded my anticipations. I never imagined that Burmah would be reduced with ease. I never expected that it would be reduced to order except after a considerable period of time. It took no less than 10 years to reduce Lower Burmah to order, though its state of civilization was more advanced; and, no doubt, though the skill of our agents is greater now than then, we must look forward to a long period before public order is established in the country recently annexed. Then as to another point, the inference which the right hon. Gentleman drew as to the omission from the Speech of any reference to foreign affairs that no grave or alarming question was now under the notice of Her Majesty's Government with regard to these matters in an absolutely correct inference. It was evident, from Lord Salisbury's remarks at the Mansion House the other night, that there is nothing in the state of foreign affairs which should seriously disquiet the minds of Her Majesty's Ministers. In the various affairs of this Empire there are always difficult and complicated questions arising out of our relations with foreign countries; but at present there is nothing, so far as I am aware, abnormal or unusual which would call upon us to depart in any way from the assurance with regard to foreign affairs which was given in the last Parliament in the last Queen's Speech. I will now proceed, if the House will allow me, to state the views of the Government on what the right hon. Gentleman called rightly and properly the question of the day—I allude to the question of Ireland. But before stating in any detail the views of the Government on that question, I may, perhaps, be permitted to remark upon the somewhat doubtful compliment which the right hon. Gentleman permitted himself to use towards the Government and Gentlemen on this side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman congratulated us on the difference of our attitude now and that held last January. He said there was a remarkable difference between the attitude we now held with regard to social order in Ireland and the attitude which the late Conservative Government took up on the 26th of January last. The right hon. Gentleman could not account for that change of attitude. He said that as far as the figures of crime go there is no reason for the change, and he could not imagine any satisfactory explanation of it. But, Sir, has there been no change in the position of the Irish Question since January last? Why the largest, widest, and most momentous change which has ever taken place has come over the Irish Question since that date. Since the 26th of January the right hon. Gentleman has taken the lead of the National Party in Ireland, and to the cause of the Repeal of the Union the right hon. Gentleman has brought over for the first time a very large majority of a great historic Party. Is that, Sir, no change? Well, how does that affect, and how does the Government consider that it affects, the state of social order in Ireland? There has been long an Organization in Ireland which aims at the Repeal of the Union, and that Organization is worked from time to time by methods which this House has regarded as treasonable and criminal. But since the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends assumed the lead of the National Party in Ireland, since they have made themselves responsible for the actions and the policy of that Party, are not the Government right in presuming, at any rate for the time, that the methods of political agitation which are familiar to the right hon. Gentleman and are regarded as Constitutional in this country may be adopted by the Party which has hitherto been slow to adopt them? I do hold that the Government are justified in assuming that the close, intimate, and indissoluble connection which now exists between the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) warrants the conclusion at which they have arrived. The right hon. Gentleman welcomed, somewhat sarcastically, what he called our readiness, for the first time, as he seemed to imagine, to depart from the constant resort to coercion. The tendency of the right hon. Gentleman to move away from the course of coercion is of very recent growth. I have never observed, nor have the Irish Members I believe observed, any reluctance on the right hon. Gentleman's part to resort to coercion. Indeed, it was admitted by them that there was a greater reluctance among the Tories to resort to coercive legislation when they were in Office than had been displayed by the Party to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs. Then, the right hon. Gentleman went on to remark as to the time when the next Session of Parliament should commence, and he was kind enough to give us the benefit of his advice on the subject, and he also contrasted the treatment he had received from the Tories when in Opposition with the treatment which he is so generously and magnanimously prepared to mete out to us. I do not wish to deprive the right hon. Gentleman of any gratification he may derive from the contemplation of his own generosity. But I cannot, nor can my Colleagues generally, quite agree with views which the right hon. Gentleman holds. There is undoubtedly much that may be said, considering the great arrears of Public Business and the many important subjects with which Parliament would be asked to deal, in favour of Parliament meeting earlier than in February next. But, after a careful review of the situation, after having convinced ourselves of the overwhelming necessity that whatever proposals the Government should make for the development of prosperity and order in Ireland should be proposals based upon immense consideration, and also bearing in mind the enormous strain in mind the Members of Parliament and the public generally have been put, from a political point of view, ever since the great Reform controversy, Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion, apart from the occurrence of something either in home or foreign affairs which might necessitate an earlier recourse to Parliament, that it would not be wise, nor is there anything in the state of the country which demands, that we should cause Parliament to meet before the ordinary period in February. I have only one more comment to make on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot pass by altogether without notice the tendency of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to the possible non-payment of rents in Ireland. I regret he should have thought it his duty to make those remarks. I do not think that the making of them squared altogether with what appeared to be the tendency of the rest of his speech; and certainly the tendency of such remarks is extremely curious when you consider that they fell from the very author of the Land Act of 1881—an Act which the right hon. Gentleman, as the Head of the Government and his Party, solemnly guaranteed as a final settlement of the Land Question in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman now anticipates, and apparently does no vex himself with the anticipation, that the judicial rents levied under that Act may not be paid by the tenants of Ireland. Having offered that remark to the House, he states that he is not qualified to give an opinion on the subject. If that is so, it is greatly to be regretted that he should have touched on the subject at all. Why anticipate a state of things which would be most formidable, when the very anticipation from such an authority as the right hon. Gentleman might produce that very state of things which we should all so deeply deplore. And now I will ask the House to attend while I explain, as concisely as I can, the views of the Government on the Irish Question. I will deal with that question in a manner which has become by usage familiar to Members of Parliament. I will deal with it as it presents itself to the Government under the three aspects—social order, the Land Question, and local government. There is this difference, at starting, between the late Government and the present Government. The late Government were of opinion that these three questions were indissolubly connected, and their policy was to deal with them all by one measure. The present Government do not believe that the three questions are indissolubly connected, and they propose to treat them to a very large extent as totally separate and distinct. Social order we intend to treat as a question absolutely by itself. The Government are distinctly of opinion, and will not shrink from expressing it, that there is nothing in the law or in the government or in the administration of Ireland which would warrant or excuse any serious disturbance of social order. I go to the Land Question, and I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that it has only recently been the subject of large legislation, and that we certainly have been led to hope that it would be a final settlement of the question. [Cries of "No!"] I was led to hope that by the author of that great measure. With regard to the question of local government, we wish to treat it as a question for the United Kingdom as a whole. But I come back to the first head of the subject—namely, the present state of social order in Ireland. The House might be interested in one or two figures as to crime in Ireland generally. The right hon. Gentleman himself quoted a few; but they were of a slightly misleading character. I take the total agrarian crimes for the first six months of this year, and compare them with the total for the first six months of last year, and I find, as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, that there is an increase, not inconsiderable, of agrarian crime. The total for the six months of this year is 551, while the total for the first six months of last year was 399. But that increase is almost entirely due to one part of Ireland alone. I allude to the county of Kerry. If you subtract the figures of crime in the county of Kerry from the total amount of agrarian crime in Ireland, you will find that there has been a reduction, or, at any rate, no increase; but if I take the year 1881-2—a period when the right hon. Gentleman was in power and was at the head of affairs—if I take that period as what may be called a standard of acute disturbance of social order in Ireland, I find that, whereas the total of agrarian crimes for the first six months of this year is 551, in the first six months of 1881 it was 2,310. It is absolutely necessary for the right comprehension of the question that you should not only compare one period with another, but take great periods of disturbance and compare the present time with them. That is a general view, and although I think that many would agree—perhaps no one would disagree—that the amount of general agrarian crime in Ireland is larger considerably than it ought to be under a settled state of things, still, I do not know whether, considering all the crises that Ireland has gone through, the present amount of agrarian crime is as serious as might have been expected. But there are two parts of Ireland to which these remarks do not apply. There are two parts of Ireland which have been specially disturbed, and where the disturbance is acute. I allude, in the first place, to the greater part of Kerry, and to parts of the counties of Cork, Clare, Limerick, and Galway; and I allude, in the second place, to Belfast, which has been a scene of great disturbance. In the districts of the South and West disturbance has become not only acute, but chronic; it has even excited the strong disapproval of the Nationalist journal in that part of the world. In Belfast the disturbance has not yet become chronic, and the Government are determined that it shall not become so. There have been serious riots in that town ever since the 6th of June—riots which have excited the utmost pain and anxiety in this country—which have led, I regret to say, to a serious loss of life, no less than 25 persons having, I believe, met their death—[An Irish MEMBER: More!—besides many women and children and innocent persons being seriously injured. They have been accompanied by a great amount of damage to private and municipal property, and they have been followed by an arrest of business and of industry from the effects of which, I fear, the town will suffer for many a long day. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has informed the House that it is the intention of the Government to order a searching inquiry into the origin of these riots. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] I trust that the hon. Members who are indulging in those manifestations will not think that I am the least insensible to the hint they convey; but I cannot help hoping that if those manifestations are to be indulged in to any great extent they may at least be placed before the House in a definite and intelligible form, by which the opinion of the House upon those insinuations and imputations may be elicited in a distinct manner. But I turn to the question of what the Government have done for the suppression of the riots, and my right hon. Friend has instructed me to tell the House that the latest accounts from Belfast are of a very reassuring character, and that the best authorities are of opinion that the state of excitement is subsiding, and that there are prospects of a speedy restoration of order and tranquillity. The Government have not been idle even during the short time in which they have been in Office. A great number of persons have been arrested; 230 rioters have been arrested, of whom 146 have been summarily convicted, 43 sent for trial, 29 remanded, and only 18 discharged. I think that those figures will show that Her Majesty's Executive is doing its duty; but I am also authorized to add that if the number of rioters who are committed for trial should be sufficient to warrant the step, a Special Commissioner will be sent to Belfast to try them, as was done, I believe, after the great riots of 1864. But not only have the Government endeavoured to stimulate the energies of the Executive so far as the resident magisterial portion of the Executive are concerned, but the town has also been occupied by a large force of military which is in direct charge of the General Commanding the Northern District of Ireland. The military are in Belfast not for ornament or show, but for action if required. Many of the officers have been invested with special magisterial power, which would enable them to take immediate action in an emergency. There is also a very large force of police concentrated in the town, and those police will be maintained in Belfast until complete order and tranquillity are restored. Will the House permit me to make one passing observation on the Irish Police? The House is no doubt aware that accusations of a very serious kind have been very freely made from certain quarters against the Royal Irish Constabulary in relation to their conduct at Belfast. I utterly decline to discuss for one moment those accusations. There may or there may not have been individual instances of indiscipline or individual instances of reckless anticipation of orders. If those instances are proved before the proper tribunal, the individuals convicted will be punished by the proper authorities; but this I am prepared to say, that the Government will not countenance nor tolerate for one single moment any hostility, overt or concealed, against the Constabulary of Belfast. I rejoice to hear from my right hon. and gallant Friend the Mover of the Address his expressions of confidence in the Royal Irish Constabulary. We are in cordial agreement on that point with him. We are aware that the Royal Irish Constabulary have a great and glorious record of service rendered to the State during many years, and in many periods of great anxiety and public danger. The Government are sensible of the great value of that record, and they are perfectly confident that the Force, as a whole, is still animated by all the traditions of its history and origin. The Government rely on the Constabulary, and they will support that Force in the effective discharge of its most difficult and sometimes delicate duties. But if there is any portion of the inhabitants of Belfast who allow themselves to be under the impression that they can safely, or with any amount of impunity, indulge in violence or hostility against the police, those parties will make a most serious and fatal error, for which they will probably have to pay the heaviest penalties. But, speaking generally about Belfast, I believe I am expressing the sentiments of the Chief Secretary and of the entire Government, when I say that we are resolutely determined to restore and to maintain order in Belfast, and to shrink from no responsibility which will enable us to attain that end, and to attain it without delay. I now ask the House to allow me to direct its attention to the disturbed districts in the South and West of Ireland. The cause of those disturbances—which, as I have said, have become chronic and acute—is due to secret intimidation, “Boycotting,” and “Moonlighting.” I will give to the House the figures relating to “Boycotting” and “Moonlighting” in general. There has been a very serious increase in crime in Kerry. It has increased in the first six months of this year, as compared with the first six months of last year, from the total of 65 agrarian offences to a total of 135—more than double. “Boycotting” in Kerry and Clare, which in July, 1885, had only reached the number of 62 cases, in the present July has reached 124. “Boycotting” all over Ireland does not show the same serious augmentation. In 1886 the cases wholly or partly of “Boycotting” all over Ireland are 890, compared with 533 in 1885. But it is in Kerry where this feature of “Boycotting” outrages and “Moonlighting” shows itself in the most unpleasant form, and the House will be curious to know the number of persons who are under the special protection of the police in Kerry, as it will illustrate very forcibly the state of terror which obtains in the "Boycotted" part of Ireland. In July, 1885, there were 145 persons who required protection, and 292 policemen were employed in that duty. In July, 1886, the number was only 56, the police occupied being 107.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Have you the figures for the whole year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I am not making comparisons between different Administrations. I am endeavouring to depict to the House the extent of crime in Kerry. To show the number of police who are taken away from their duties in order to protect people, I may mention the case of Lord Kenmare, a most amiable, estimable Irish nobleman, the respected late Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. For the protection of his person, his residence, farms, &c., 38 constables were specially employed. For the same purpose, in the case of Miss Thompson, a landowner in Kerry, 32 constables were engaged.

[Mr. PARNELL: Give us the evictions.] This will show the House pretty clearly what the state of affairs is in that part of the world; and, judging from the small number of arrests that have recently been made, and the growing boldness of criminals—for instance, a few days ago, in open daylight, a police patrol was fired upon—Her Majesty's Government are unable to be absolutely certain that the Executive machinery is as sufficient as might be wished for the detection and prevention of crime in that part of the world, or altogether as adequate as the circumstances of the case require. In 1871 the right hon. Gentleman opposite had to deal with a similar state of things in the county of Westmeath, and for that purpose he proposed a secret Committee to take secret evidence, and on the Report of that Committee he suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and the result was a very serious diminution of the crime and disorder in Westmeath. But Her Majesty's Government are anxious—in fact, are resolved—to satisfy their minds fully on the point which I previously mentioned to the House before going into extreme measures. They are going to make a very resolute effort, either by means of the agencies well within their power, to force the "Moonlighters" and criminals to desist from their lawless courses, or to take such measures as will inevitably bring them to speedy justice. With that view, Her Majesty's Government have decided to appoint a special military officer of high rank and varied experience to the command of the disturbed districts, with such powers as we believe will enable him to organize arrangements for the restoration of order and for the cessation of the reign of terror which there prevails. This general officer will be directly responsible to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary; and the officer whom Her Majesty's Government have selected, and who has consented to undertake the duty, is Sir Redvers Buller. Speaking generally and specially, both with regard to the disturbances of social order in Ireland and in those districts I have named, and with regard to Belfast, it is the absolute determination of the Government to use to their very utmost all the existing powers of the ordinary law—to use to their very utmost all the machinery, whether magisterial, police, or military, for the purpose of restoring or maintaining order—the first duty of the Government of every civilized community. But, Sir, this I can pledge the Government to—that at the very first moment that the Government becomes conscious that they are not fulfilling that which they regard as their highest duty, and that further power and strength are necessary—at that moment they will come to Parliament and lay their case before it, and claim with all confidence from Parliament such legislation as they may deem to be necessary. I now come to the Land Question. With regard to the Land Question in Ireland, the Government are aware that various allegations are being put forward with great vigour and great assurance from many quarters as to the condition of the Irish Land Question. We are informed, or we hear it said, that judicial rents under the Land Act were fixed at a great deal too high a rate; and we also hear it alleged that the fall in the price of produce has rendered tenants unable to pay those judicial rents, even if they had not been fixed too high; and we are told that there is now, or will soon be, a general failure to pay rent in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are by no means satisfied that there is any serious reason for any one of these allegations. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to admit that the judicial rents fixed by the Commissioners were at any too high a rate. The Government are further of opinion that it is quite possible the fall in the prices of produce—I allude especially to the fall in the staple article of Irish produce, butter—may be due quite as much to careless or defective manufacture, or to adulteration, as to any general depreciation in prices. Then Her Majesty's Government assume, as I think they are bound to assume, that the Commissioners under the Land Act in fixing judicial rents for so long a period as 15 years left ample scope for any exceptional fall in prices. ["No!"] Well, that is the assumption of Her Majesty's Government. But, Sir, I speak with regard to the present purpose of the Government and the view they take of the present position of the Land Question, and I say that for all present purposes we take our stand on the Land Act of 1881, which was declared by its authors to be and accepted by Parliament as a final settlement of the Land Question. That Act, as supplemented by the Arrears Act of 1882 and as amended by the Land Purchase Act of 1885, Her Majesty's Government regard as a very valid and binding contract, which was made at that time between the State on the one hand and the landlords and tenants of Ireland on the other, and the policy of Her Majesty's Government will be to see that all legal obligations and all legal processes arising out of that Act are strictly enforced and perfectly carried out so far as such action can come within the province of an Executive Government. If there are any persons in this House who are of opinion that there will be by the Government any interference with or suspension, by legislation or the neglect of executive action, of the right of landlords to recover their land in the event of non-payment of rent, they fall into great and serious error. We are told that if we adopt the policy of that kind there will be a general movement all over Ireland in the form of a passive resistance to the payment of rent. I take leave, in conjunction with my Colleagues, to disbelieve that statement altogether and to disregard that menace. With regard to what the farmers have acquired under the Act of 1881, they have obtained a right possessing a distinct money value, which right the Government are equally bound to regard, and we do not believe that the farmers of Ireland would consent to take part in any such scheme as threatened, or would consent to sacrifice or imperil those rights. Nor do we think that the movement in favour of non-payment of rent of 1881 has any chance, under present circumstances, of being generally repeated, in consequence of the great change which has come over the farmers of Ireland since that time. That is the statement of the policy of the Government with regard to the Land Question in Ireland at the present time. At the same time I would wish to add this further. It has been brought to the knowledge of Her Majesty's present Government that a very large number of Members of Parliament on both sides of the House and in both Houses have always entertained very serious doubts as to the economical soundness of the machinery for the valuation of rents provided by the Act of 1881. Doubts were expressed by many Members of his Party as to the economical soundness of the system of double ownership, described with matchless force of eloquence and satire by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1870. Many Members of his Party, of the moderate Liberal Party, doubted this part of the Land Act of 1881. We hold that the machinery of that Act was imperfect and of a rough and ready character, and that if it did contain anything of good, whatever good it did contain was damaged, impaired, and tainted by the violence, outrage, and crime in the midst of which, and in consequence of which, it was created and brought into operation. The advocates of that Act looked upon it as being of a temporary character. The noble Lord the present Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) made a speech in Lancashire at that time in which he described the character of the machinery as most temporary, as being what he called a modus vivendi, and as intended to tide over the period which was to elapse, and must necessarily elapse, between the dis-establishment of the system of double ownership and the establishment of a system of single ownership. Now, Sir, Her Majesty's Government are strongly of opinion — after all that has passed in connection with this Land Question and in view of the very conflicting and strong opinions freely expressed from many and various quarters—that the time has arrived when they ought to have at their command for their guidance in the future, authentic information of a distinctly official and weighty character as to the working and the present position of the Land Question in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are aware that a great and widespread Organization has endeavoured, not without success, arbitrarily to control the working of that Act for their own ends, and they are aware that, at any rate with regard to a great part of Ireland, there does not exist at the present time perfect freedom of action in the rural community with regard to the sale or the cultivation or the hiring of land. Her Majesty's Government are, moreover, further aware that a general depression of trade and agriculture has affected England and Scotland most severely, and a great portion of the civilized world, and may be inferred to have produced some effect upon the land system of Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are also aware that many landlords in Ireland have felt it to be their duty to make large reductions to their tenants, particularly reductions of rent, which have not been hitherto made the subject of judicial arbitration; and they are aware that there is a general disposition amongst the tenantry to claim still further large reductions. I think the House will agree that these are matters which, though they are matters of imperfect information, are still matters of grave moment and concern to the Government and to Parliament; and that, as regards the future, they are matters on which authentic official information are absolutely essential to Her Majesty's Government. Sir, with that view, and at the same time asking the House, in order to avoid all misapprehension, to bear in mind the remarks which I venture to make as to the policy of the Government with regard to the right which may have been acquired and confirmed under the Act of 1881 at the present time — bearing those remarks in mind, the Government have decided to appoint a Royal Commission — [Opposition and Home Rule laughter] — which shall during this coming autumn and winter investigate with all care and knowledge and experience the Land Question at present obtaining in Ireland. [Laughter from the Opposition and Home Rulers.] I do not know why the project of the Government should excite derision either above or below the Gangway opposite; but I freely confess that there is an enormous and great advantage on the side of hon. Gentlemen opposite as compared with hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. We do not possess the enormous advantage which they possess of intuitive knowledge; and we are of opinion that with regard to so vast a question as the Land Question in Ireland all official authentic information which can be obtained is absolutely necessary before any policy can be finally determined upon. And that was the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite a few years ago when they determined to deal with the Land Question. ["No!" from the Front Opposition Bench.] Certainly—the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member declined to deal with the Land Question in Ireland until they had appointed a Commission to furnish them with the information on the subject. I only make these remarks because I fail altogether to understand the derisive cheering of the right hon. Gentleman. The terms of reference to that Commission have been naturally to the Government a subject of the most anxious care and of the most prolonged and protracted deliberation. The names of the Commissioners we are not yet prepared to state to the House. Indeed, Sir, I will frankly state that the view of the House generally with regard to the subject-matter of inquiry will be of use to the Government before deciding on the final selection of the Commissioners. But this will be the principal anxiety of the Government, that the Commission shall be in the main an Irish Commission, and that all the chief parties and views in Ireland shall be fairly represented upon it; and I may say that any representation upon that point from any section of Irish Members will be received by Her Majesty's Government with all respect, and will receive from them full and as favourable consideration as possible. But, though we are not able to state the names of the Commissioners, perhaps the House will allow me to read to them the terms of Reference; because the terms of Reference, with the remarks which I have ventured to inflict on the House, will explain with some completeness the views of the Government on this question, and will, moreover, indicate the ultimate object of their policy on the Land Question in Ireland. The terms of Reference are these. The Commissioners will be appointed to inquire to what extent, if any, and in what parts of Ireland the operation of the Land Act of 1881 is affected either by combination to resist the enforcement of legal obligations, or by an exceptional fall in the price of produce; also to inquire to what extent there exists any general desire among tenants to avail themselves of the provisions of the Land Purchase Act of 1885, and whether the operation of that Act might be expedited and extended, especially in the congested districts, by providing security through the intervention of Local Authorities for loans advanced from public funds for the purchase of land, and to report whether any modifications of the law are necessary. I will venture to point out the leading features of that Reference. The Commissioners are directed to inquire into two specific matters in the first place. And the object of that has been to a considerable extent to narrow the range of operations, so that their proceedings may not be too dilatory and protracted. We confidently hope that the Report of this Commission may be furnished to the Government before the close of next spring. But a serious mistake will be made by any who think that the Government contemplate any further dealing with the Land Question in Ireland in the direction of any revision of the rent by the interposition of the State. That is altogether apart from the policy of the present Government. We are rather bound to the other solution of the Land Question in Ireland—single ownership—which was undoubtedly the main object of the Act of 1881. It is the main object of the Act of 1881; it is the main object of the Act of 1885, which was concurred in by all Parties in the House; and it was the main object of the Bill introduced by the right

hon. Gentleman opposite in the last Parliament. The system of single ownership of land in Ireland, we believe, may be the ultimate solution of most of the difficulties of the Land Question; and though Her Majesty's Government will not be prepared, as far they are at present informed, to extend the liabilities of the State, as provided under the Act of 1885, they may be prepared to submit to the House proposals, if additional securities should be provided in the shape of Local Authorities. They may be prepared to submit proposals to the House for an additional outlay of public money. Well, Sir, there is one more subject on which I am anxious to speak to the House; but I fear I have already spoken at great length. There is another matter on which the Government are also resolved to acquire full and authentic information. It is a matter on which much has been said and written during many years. It is the question of the development of the material resources of Ireland. The constant allegation made by men of all Parties in Ireland has been that those resources have been neglected by the people and by the State, and that the capacity of Ireland for maintaining a much larger population even than she at present maintains is undoubted if those material resources could be developed by the infusion of capital into Ireland. On this question Her Majesty's Government propose to utilize the autumn and winter by procuring the very best authentic information. [Opposit on laughter.] I really would appeal to hon. Members opposite to allow me to place these views before the House without more interruption than is absolutely necessary for the relief of their feelings, for the simple reason that interruption causes me to detain the House longer than I would wish. But I was saying that the Government are desirous to obtain on that subject the best authentic information at their command, and to procure it by a particular method. The Government have determined to appoint a small Commission of three Gentlemen, who, by their position and standing and experience in engineering, scientific, agricultural, and contracting circles, will be able to give, after full examination, conclusive information to the Government on that most disputed point. The exact terms of the Reference to that Commission are not yet drawn, and the Commissioners themselves are not yet selected; but the Government were anxious to place this portion of their policy without delay before Parliament, and I can state to the House the main lines of the inquiry which the Government contemplate. The Gentlemen who will form that Commission will be appointed to inquire and advise whether, by the outlay of public money, and upon what reasonable terms, the material resources of Ireland can be developed, and the energies of her people stimulated, and private enterprise attracted into that country. Our inquiries will divide themselves into three convenient and distinct channels. The Commissioners will consider the possibility of the creation of a great deep-sea fishing industry on the West Coast of Ireland by the construction of harbours of refuge, and the connection of those harbours with the main lines of rapid communication. The Government express no opinion as to the possibility of such a work. [Home Rule laughter.] But it is not a proposal to be derided. If such a thing were possible, and could be carried out, it would be worth a great effort and some risk on the part of Parliament; for it would undoubtedly, if successful, remove what has always been, and must always be, a source of intense anxiety to an Irish Government—namely, the extremely precarious position of the population on the West Coast, a population, I will say, than whom none is more deserving of the sympathy and support of Parliament. On this branch they would be especially directed to examine the railways, tramways, and road communication all over Ireland; and the Commissioners would be specially directed to examine the capacity and the management compared with that of other countries of the system of railways now in existence, in relation more particularly to the facilities afforded by those railways to the public generally, to private enterprise, and to private traders in particular. The third main branch of the inquiry will be the question of arterial drainage, and whether those great drainage works which prosperous agriculture would seem to require for those great river phenomena of the Shannon, the Bann, and the Barrow are not far too considerable to be attempted by the resources of single localities, and whether such large arterial drainage ought not, and could not, be remuneratively undertaken by the State for the benefit of the community at large. I now come to the third question—that of Irish government, on which I can only say that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to devote the Recess, which we hope will be one of due length, to the careful consideration of the question of local government for all the Three Kingdoms. When Parliament re-assembles in the beginning of February next year the Government are sanguine that they will be prepared with definite proposals on that large question. Their object will be, as far as possible, to eliminate Party feelings, and to secure for the consideration of the question as large an amount of Parliamentary co-operation as can be obtained, so that, whatever settlement may be arrived at, it may not be regarded as a great political triumph of either Party, but rather in the nature of a final, durable, and lasting settlement. On this question of local government I have nothing to add. We are perfectly certain to fall into no errors on account of any hurry or undue haste. No amount of taunts, or jeers, or denunciation will make us budge one inch from our determination. At the same time, I may remind the House that it is not altogether without guidance as to the mind of the Government on this question. The Queen's Speech of January last announced the introduction of a Bill with regard to local government in England as well as in Ireland, and considerable progress had been made with the details of that scheme when the Government were roughly and incontinently ejected from Office. Speeches made at the time by those who are Ministers now would, I think, throw a good deal of light in the direction in which Her Majesty's Government will probably work. Nothing has occurred since which would lead us in any way widely to extend the limits of the policy we then laid down. On the contrary, everything that has occurred since then has tended to confirm and strengthen us in the view we then took on the subject of local government. The great sign-posts of our policy were at that time and are still equality, similarity, and, if I may use such a word, simultaneity of treatment as far as is practicable in the development of a genuinely popular system of local government in all the four countries which form the United Kingdom. That is really all I have to say to the House as to the views of the Government upon the Irish Question. I have stated, I believe, fully and frankly the main outlines of our present policy. The principal basis of that policy is undoubtedly the restoration and the maintenance of social order in Ireland, and of individual freedom to the widest extent which social order will permit. To that end we are determined, at all cost to ourselves as individuals and as a Government, to adhere, relying on the support of a great English political Party. On that foundation our policy reposes; but there is yet another, a deeper, stronger, and wider foundation—I mean the verdict of the British people as delivered with no doubtful sound at the recent General Election. The verdict of the people we take to have been clear, resonant, and unmistakably in favour of the maintenance of the Legislative Union between the two countries and of the supremacy as it exists now of the Imperial Parliament and of the full and effective sovereignty of the Queen over the whole of the United Kingdom. That verdict, for the purposes of the Government, we take to be what Lord Salisbury called it, a final and irreversible verdict, the finality and irreversibility of which cannot be in the smallest degree impugned except after another appeal to the country. On that final and irreversible verdict we, as a Government, take our stand now. Upon it we base our policy, not only for Ireland, but for the United Kingdom and the British Empire as a whole. By that policy so founded we, as a Government and as a Party in both Houses, will stand or fall.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) said, that the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it had failed to prove anything else, had proved mainly one fact—that Her Majesty's Government, during the short time that had elapsed since their accession to Office, had not succeeded in realizing the gravity of the responsibility which rested upon them, and the many duties which inhered in them in relation to the government of Ireland. The unexcited tone of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech would, no doubt, satisfy the feelings of the average Englishman; but in Ireland the news that so many Commissions of Inquiry on so many subjects were proposed to be appointed would excite not only deep disappointment, but an emotion of actual despair. It was absolutely cruel on the part of a Minister of the Crown to rise in his place at this critical period and tell the people of Ireland that after all these years nothing could be done for them except the appointment of fresh Commissions to inquire into the condition of the country. Commissions of Inquiry had been the perpetual solace of the Irish people; but there was a general sickness and disgust in Ireland at such a policy, in the wake of which anything ameliorative had rarely followed. He repudiated the notion that the Government had nothing to do for Ireland except that advised by the hon. Member the Seconder of the Address (Mr. Maclean)—namely, to stay in Office reaping spoils whilst neglecting duties. From such a fool's paradise the Government would find themselves suddenly and energetically awakened. The policy of Ministers—the policy of procrastination, of putting off the evil hour, based as it was on the fancy belief that the result of the polls had given them warranty, would prove in its effects worse than absurd—it was self-destructive. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had tried to make out that the verdict of the people of Great Britain was complete and irrevocable against Home Rule. But a complete verdict against Home Rule would mean, as he understood it, that the great majority of the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland had declared distinctly against it. That was not the case, for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was composed of four distinct States—namely, England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland; and of those four States three had declared emphatically and unmistakably in favour of granting to the people of Ireland a restitution of their right to rule themselves. Therefore he concluded that the verdict was inchoate—far from complete. England had no right of arrogating to herself the claim of over-riding the representative rights of the remaining three nationalities. As a matter of fact, it was only a small majority of the people of England who were preventing Ireland from enjoying that which they would enjoy when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been relegated to a more obscure Bench in that House. There were rumours of Home Rule agitation in Scotland, and the wishes of the people there would not be lessened by the mode in which the aspirations of the Irish people were put on one side by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It appeared that the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to put off the evil hour; but he knew quite well at the same time that it was folly to talk of Home Rule as being dead and buried, especially when Scotland and Wales and Ireland had very largely and emphatically set forth the policy of Home Rule. The right hon. and gallant Member the Mover of the Address (Colonel King-Harman) had stated that he had noticed symptoms of the Irish people beginning to tire of agitation; but anyone who knew the people of Ireland thoroughly, and who knew also the organization that had been at work to promote the cause of Home Rule, must say that the result of the late Elections had tended to intensify the energies of the Nationalists everywhere. The Irish people were never more determined and more eager in the struggle than they were now. They were not now fighting alone and without hope. The hon. Member the Seconder of the Address had stated that it would be the desire and intention of the Tory Party to propose some scheme for knitting more closely together the component parts of the British Empire; but they were neglecting the opportunity which they had in their power for uniting more closely the people of Ireland and the people of England. The federation of which the hon. Gentleman had spoken was impossible without first giving a Legislature to Ireland, and perhaps, also, to Scotland. The quietude of Ireland had been remarkable during the whole course of this agitation; but the Government must not think that this extreme quietude had been due to a growing desire on the part of the people to be temperate, or to a more satisfactory state of things between landlords and tenants. The Irish people had made great sacrifices, and had put up with even extra acts of injustice on the part of the landlords, in order that the country might remain quiet during the struggle, and so that the men who were working for their cause in that House might not be prejudiced. The farmers could not get anything for their corn, and they asked how, then, could they pay the same rents as they paid when prices were high? The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government would probably find, even before the Commissioners were appointed, that it would be necessary to take some steps to prevent the landlords from exacting impossible rents; and if that was not done, the noble Lord would not have so long a Vacation as he imagined, and when Parliament met again in February it would not be with a people ready to meet them halfway they would have to deal, but with men the fiercest passions of whose hearts would have been aroused. The noble Lord lacked all feeling of responsibility with regard to Ireland. His character was to come to the front, no matter by what means. He knew nothing about Ireland, and therefore he had no better remedy to propose than the appointment of a Commission which would suggest relief some time after the people had been evicted. He hoped the noble Lord, having recovered from the intoxication of feeling himself for the first time Chancellor of the Exchequer, would do something more than appoint a Commission. In his opinion, it was not unlikely that the Belfast riots were the result of the language of an aspirant to the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Until the Chancellor of the Exchequer went to that town all was quiet. It might be an awkward thing for the noble Lord if he went there now and was asked by the victims of the advice he had given what compensation he was prepared to give them for the losses they had sustained. One of the very first Gentlemen who ought to be called before the Commission to give evidence as to the origin of the riots was the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself; and the Commissioners who were to inquire into the origin of those riots ought to be called upon to decide whether a Minister of the Crown was not as liable, for using language inciting to riot and bloodshed, as any other citizen.

Mr. HARRIS (Galway, E.) said, he had been in strong hopes that the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have announced the determination of the Government to bring forward some strong measure of relief for the people of Ireland. Considering the present state of the farmers throughout the country, it was extraordinary that a policy of delay should have been adopted. He was afraid such a policy would result in something very serious in Ireland. The appointment of a Royal Commission had proved to be quite useless; and if they wanted really to relieve the distressed peasantry of the West of Ireland something very different should be done. Loyalty was the result of amicable relations between the governed and the governor. If the Irish people were deprived of a rule which would be at once smooth and just—if, in fact, they were not governed according to their own moral lights and aspirations, naturally a political friction, a state of disorder, would result. But for this coercion would be no remedy, because coercion would not be applied effectively until either the local government the Irish people desired had been tried and had been found to fail, or, at least, Constitutional methods had been applied to existing institutions, buttresses as they were for supporting the privileges of an aristocracy which had constantly endeavoured to outstride the common sense of the country and found to be wanting. He did not approve of any appeal to sectarian spirit in Ireland, yet he recognized that this factor had a good deal to do with the difficulty of that country. He would conclude by asking the Government not to be blinded by foolish objections to Home Rule, and to cease to support the props of the minority in Ireland, in the Press, and on the platform, who had earned for themselves the epithet of disloyal.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I listened to the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as, I am sure, did every other hon. Member, with the greatest interest, on the occasion of his debut to-night as Leader of the Government in this House. I also listened to the noble Lord with anxious eagerness to learn what was the policy which the Government proposed for my country. I am certainly surprised that the noble Lord has not been better able, with his great abilities, to disguise more skilfully than he has succeeded in doing the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to Ireland. That policy I take to be simply to do nothing whatever, but to avoid the Irish Question, and, in the meantime, to enjoy the sweets of Office. That seems to me to be a fair representation of the noble Lord's speech from beginning to end, and to be the first and last object of Her Majesty's Government. The whole burden of the speech of the noble Lord was the institution of a succession of Commissions of Inquiry. The noble Lord has promised to consider and inquire into everything. The noble Lord's Government with regard to Ireland may be fittingly described as a Government of Consideration and Inquiry. We have already had Commissions of Inquiry without end into all the subjects into which the noble Lord proposes to inquire in the coming winter, and what has been the outcome of them? We have had occasionally, in times of depression and distress, employment doled out through the Board of Works to a starving population, and a number of useless officials have been appointed to superintend them. The noble Lord desires to dangle bribes before the people of Ireland, and these Royal Commissions, of which the people have already had more than enough. Such a proposal is one which neither does credit to the noble Lord nor to his Government. The Government in Ireland in former days bribed the Legal and other Professions to a very considerable extent. Even the middle classes were bribed by honours and privileges; and now, by a large expenditure upon useless works, it is proposed to bribe the working classes. I do not think that anybody in Ireland is likely to be deceived or taken in by such a proposition as that. The question of the hour in Ireland is the question of land evictions, and the noble Lord almost gave that question a complete go-by in his speech. He stated that it was not proposed to consider the question of rent in Ireland at present, but that it might be desirable to consider the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act at some future day. We all consider that that is a desirable thing to do; but we cannot forget that while the noble Lord is now in favour of lending English money for the purchase of Irish land upon security, by no means as good as that which was offered when the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition was before the House, there has been no one who has denounced more strongly the policy of pledging

[First Night.]

British credit for the purchase of Irish land. The noble Lord now proposes that there should be an extension of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act, and that facilities for the purchase of land should be given on the security of certain local rates. The Irish people, through their Representatives here, were willing in the last Parliament, in connection with the Prime Minister's Bill, to give the credit of the whole country—a pledge which they would willingly and cheerfully have kept—for the purchase of the Irish land. But the noble Lord and his Party, and the Irish landlords, got their last chance; they refused to take it, and the opportunity has now passed of ever getting a similar pledge from Ireland. Never again will the Irish Representatives agree that the rates of Ireland should be pledged to help the landlords out of their difficulties. I have said that this question of evictions in Ireland is the question of the hour. There are Gentlemen with extreme Radical views, such as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who gave so much aid to the noble Lord's Party in bringing them into power, who proposed in the last Parliament the introduction of a Bill to restrain evictions in Ireland. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman in particular will impress upon the Government, with whom he must naturally possess so much influence, the necessity of carrying out now the view which he expressed then. To my knowledge, in the South of Ireland evictions are being spread broadcast over the land. In one instance, within my own knowledge, in a certain Poor Law Board, of which I happened to be an ex officio member, a resolution was proposed by the Chairman of the Union, who belonged to the landlord party, which was in a majority on the Board, which prevented the Relieving Officer from reporting to the Poor Law Board any notices of eviction which might be served. I think that shows the way in which these evictions are likely to be scattered broadcast throughout the land. The time, however, has passed by when the people of Ireland are likely to sit still under a system of wholesale evictions, and allow themselves to be driven into the workhouses and the emigrant ships, as in former times. I am satisfied that if steps are not taken immediately to stay this iniquitous process of eviction the ultimate result must be coercive measures. I trust that the noble Lord and Her Majesty's Government will not allow any time to be wasted before they take this question of rents and evictions into their serious consideration, together with the question of the sale of the tenants' interest for arrears of rent for nominal sums. The decision of such questions ought at once to be taken from the landlords and placed in the hands of gentlemen who are capable of dealing with them impartially. The people of Ireland now know something of their power, and it is most undesirable that any hesitation on the part of Her Majesty's Government should lead to further agitation, trouble, and turmoil in that country. The noble Lord, in his remarks with regard to what the Government proposed to do in reference to the future of local government in Ireland, said, that during the autumn and winter there will be inquiries into that subject also. It is apparent, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government are not likely to err through undue haste. He also expressed his opinion that when this great measure of local government which is to be introduced has been passed, as he expects it will be, by a large majority of the House, if not almost unanimously, there will be a final and lasting settlement of the Irish National difficulty. Now, I want to know if the noble Lord had any arrière pensées when he made that remark? He knows very well that no mere appointment of Vestries or County Boards, or such measures as seem to be contemplated by himself and his Party, are likely to be final or lasting. The Irish Party, in the last few months, have gained an immense amount of strength to the national cause, and they are not likely to entertain anything but the highest hopes from the future. I would, therefore, tell the noble Lord that he makes the greatest possible mistake if he thinks that any settlement of the Irish Question likely to be of a lasting character will be obtained by any measure one whit below that which was offered to the last Parliament by the late Prime Minister. Though I sat in the last Parliament, this is the first occasion on which I have addressed the House; and with these few remarks I beg to thank the House for the patience and attention with which they have listened to me.

Mr. Murphy

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin County, S.): It appears to me that there can be no question as to the character of the commission with which the Irish Members have been entrusted by their constituents, and the nature of the mandate which they are asked to lay before Parliament. We have been returned to this Parliament for the purpose of asking for the restoration of our nationality. That is the main principle for which we contend, and the main object with which we have been sent here. Nevertheless, although that fact is well known to Her Majesty's Government, in the Speech of Her Majesty, which has been read to the House to-day, I have not been able to discover any declaration of the intentions of the Government in regard to the Irish National Question. I therefore think I am justified in asking for an express intimation from the Government as to what their intentions are, especially in regard to one pressing question—namely, that of evictions. There can be no doubt that in a great many cases the present rents imposed in Ireland cannot be realized. The judicial rents were, for the most part, fixed at a time when the prices of produce were much higher than they are at present, and when the seasons also had been much more favourable to the tenant farmer. This year, although the crops have been better than in former years, there is considerable apprehension that it will be impossible to save them properly; and, if that be so, the farmers will be unable to realize a profit from the land, and will undoubtedly be unable to pay the rents which have been judicially fixed. The consequence will be that in many instances steps will be taken by the landlords to carry out evictions; and unless steps can be taken to stay evictions in the coming winter the Government must be responsible for any disturbances that may take place. There is another matter which I desire to bring under the notice of the House, and that is the extraordinary change which has taken place in the sentiments of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address (Colonel King-Harman) in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Not many years ago the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was quite as advanced a Nationalist as any hon. Member who sits below the Gangway on this side of the House; and if the House will permit me I should like to read an extract from a speech which he made some years ago—I believe in 1877—in seconding a Motion for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of Home Rule and the establishment of an Irish Parliament. In the course of that speech the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said—

"The affairs of one parish in this country were not determined by the majority in another parish, nor those of one county by the majority in another county; and, therefore, he could not understand why Irish affairs should be determined by the majority in a Parliament sitting in London. . . . He was quite aware that there were numbers of men in Ireland who confounded Home Rule with separation from England, but he kept the two subjects apart in his mind; and he reminded those who mixed them up together that the first body of men who spoke up for Home Rule were principally Protestant Conservative gentlemen. . . . There were many Irishmen of considerable intelligence and influence who would limit their demand by saying—'Give us a local Commission for Ireland who can legislate for us on such subjects as Railway and Gas Bills.' But he did not acquiesce in that limitation—far from it. If, however, the Committee, after a full and fair investigation of the subject, decided that Home Rule to that extent only should be granted, he asked that that might be granted first, and then they could discuss the other points afterwards."—(3 Hansard, [233] 1751-2.)

It appears that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has very much changed his opinions since then, and it speaks well for the sincerity of his conversion that he is able now to move an Address in reply to the Queen's Speech which utterly ignores the important questions which are now so greatly exercising the public mind in Ireland. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the course of his speech which he delivered in opening this debate, told us, among other things, that Ireland requires rest. He said that if Ireland were given rest from agitation everything would come right, and all the grievances of the Irish people would dwindle away. There can be no doubt that Ireland requires rest and quiet; it cannot be denied that the agitation which has been carried on for so many years has been a serious strain upon the resources of the country; but I can assure the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Irish people, although they are anxious for peace and rest, will never accept less than peace with honour. They were perfectly prepared to accept the measure which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for

[First Night.]

Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) lately introduced, and would have accepted it as a final settlement; but, owing to the action of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, that measure was defeated, and those who were anxious that the people of England and Ireland should join together in a better union—a real union of friendship and interests, and not a union made effective by brute force only—were disappointed. But, on the other hand, we may derive consolation by recollecting that no great Constitutional change was ever brought about without some preliminary reverses. If the measure of the right hon. Gentleman has proved a failure, we are consoled by feeling that it is only the beginning of the fight; and, although we have been told by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean), who seconded the Address, that we have received a material defeat, we do not believe that we have received any material defeat at all. On the contrary, we believe that the introduction of the Home Rule Bill is simply the beginning of the real ending, in a satisfactory manner, of the question we have assembled in this Parliament to consider. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address evidently fears very much that the agitation in Ireland will continue. He is perfectly right in that opinion. So long as the Irish people have grievances, so long will they agitate; and if hon. Gentlemen opposite are anxious to spare Ireland and the Empire the evils which follow from continued agitation, they will concede to the Irish people those Constitutional rights of which they are now bereft. I think it is much to be regretted that Her Majesty's Government have not given us some more explicit indication of their policy with regard to Ireland. They have promised a number of Commissions, which may probably be appointed at some indefinite period. These Commissions are to inquire into the state of Ireland, into the Land Question, and various other matters. We wish to know when they are to be appointed, how they are to be composed, of whom they are to be composed, and what the exact course is that is to be taken? But we are left in entire ignorance; and I would venture to express a hope that before long Her Majesty's Government will take some more decided action and take the House more completely into their confidence.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I feel that hon. Members who sit on this side of the House are bound to express some surprise at the silence which has been maintained throughout the debate upon the opposite Benches. I believe I am justified in speaking for many Members who sit on this side of the House when I say that we do not intend the debate to collapse for want of speakers, and do not intend to allow the Irish Question to fall into the abeyance into which the Party opposite seem desirous of putting it. There are many interesting speakers on the other side of the House whom we are anxious to hear. There is one right hon. Gentleman whom for the last half-hour we have been expecting to rise—I allude to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Birmingham (Mr. Matthews). The record of that right hon. and learned Gentleman is a singular one, and is likely to attract the attention of both sides of the House. We are anxious, for instance, to hear him explain when it was that he ceased to be a Home Ruler. He was a candidate for the borough of Dungarvan in 1874, and the principal pledge which he gave on that occasion was that he would support in full the programme of the Home Rule League. Not only did he promise to support that programme, and to satisfy the national sentiment, but a few days after he joined the League he gave a generous subscription of £30 towards its funds. I should like to know when the right hon. and learned Gentleman changed his opinions, or whether he has changed them at all, and if he has ceased to be a Home Ruler? Perhaps the action of the right hon. and learned Gentleman may form part of the policy of surprise which Her Majesty's Ministers may have in store for us. Perhaps the appearance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary on the Treasury Bench may be taken as an indication that what Her Majesty's Ministers say in their speeches is not meant to be what the public understand it to be, and that there may be an attempt to bring about a complete change of front on the Home Rule Question. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who proposed the Address said one thing in which I entirely agree, although I do not usually agree with him in anything. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that the Irish people wanted to be governed "firmly and fairly." I quite agree in that; but I will ask what signs are there that we are about to obtain for Ireland a firm and fair Government? Let me take the action of the Government in the steps which have been taken for the suppression of the Belfast riots. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary found, when he came into Office, a Proclamation, the object of which was to prevent the possession and use of firearms in the town of Belfast. I would ask what steps the Representatives of this firm and fair government have taken to put that Proclamation into force? Has there been one single search for arms; has one single man been arrested for the possession of arms; or is one single man to be prosecuted for the possession of arms? As a matter of fact, there has been complete inaction in this respect on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Is this total neglect to carry out the Viceregal Proclamation a sign of firmness? If it is, firmness is a very different thing from what we ordinarily understand by the word, and I very much doubt the capacity of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to be firm in anything whatever. Another sign of firmness, I suppose, is the total indifference the Government have displayed in reference to the language employed by leading Orangemen in Ireland on the subject of the Belfast riots and the action of the authorities. [A laugh.] The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) laughs at that expression; but although he may not have spoken in violent language of the action of the Irish Constabulary, he knows that some of his constituents in Ulster have freely applied to the representatives of law and order the term "Morley's murderers." The hon. Member for East Belfast Mr. De Cobain declared in a public letter that they were a set of Invincibles, and even worse than Invincibles, employed to carry out the work of assassination. I should have expected that Her Majesty's Government, whose duty it is to support the Royal Irish Constabulary, would have taken some notice of these expressions, and that, at the very least, they would have undertaken the prosecution of the hon. Member for East Belfast. I do not, however, believe that they will do anything of the sort. They are too deeply involved themselves. Another sign of firmness and fairness is to be found, I suppose, in the reception by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary of the Mayor of Belfast. If there is one man in Belfast who, beyond all others, except the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is responsible for the bloodshed, murder, and pillage which have taken place in Belfast it is the Mayor of that city. It was his bolts, nuts, and rivets that were flung at the police; it was his foreman who supplied the weapons of war; it was his establishment which contributed every day during the existence of the riots the greatest number of rioters. Yet this man was received at Dublin Castle, and consulted as to the best means of suppressing the riots. If the right hon. Gentleman had the courage of his convictions, —perhaps he has none— or, at least, the courage of his language in this House, instead of sending for the Mayor of Belfast to consult as to the best means of suppressing the riots in Belfast, he would have initiated his accession to Office by depriving that gentleman of the Commission of the Peace; and by that means he might have convinced all who were responsible for the murder, and bloodshed, and pillage which have taken place, that they would no longer be allowed to administer justice in that community. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address spoke of a policy of fairness as well as a policy of firmness. Are we to look for a policy of fairness in an incident which occurred almost immediately after the Government came into power? A trial took place four or five days after the accession of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to the Office of Chief Secretary, and after the accession of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Holmes) to the Office of Attorney General for Ireland. A man was charged with firing at the police with intent to kill. Persons who witnessed the firing gave evidence of certain acts which, according to the law laid down by the Judge, constituted a felony. The evidence was perfectly satisfactory to the mind of the Judge; nevertheless, the man who was charged with committing the offence was not convicted, but allowed to escape scot free. The gentleman who acted as chief town prosecutor, although he is usually glib and brutal enough of tongue, in this particular instance allowed the opportunity to escape, and refrained from delivering a single opening sentence in explanation of the charge. Then, again, the persons who were entrusted with the constitution of the jury allowed the jury to be packed with Orangemen. There were placed upon it 11 Protestants and Orange Catholics. If this is an example of the fairness with which the law is to be administered in Ireland, all I can say is that the meaning attached by the Government to the word "fairness" is very different from that ordinarily intended. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced to-night a policy of Royal Commissions. There is to be a Commission on the Land Question, a Commission on Trade and Industry, a Military Commission, and some others. I only wonder that he did not announce a Commission on the weather, or on the effects of the Atlantic currents on the Coast of Ireland. All I can say as to these Royal Commissions is that the proposal is calculated to insult and exasperate the feeling of the Irish people. We are sick of the policy of Commissions. There is not a single Irish question, from great national questions down to the smallest question, which has not been discussed by Royal Commissions ad nauseam, and yet those inquiries have had no practical result whatever. What was the case with regard to the Land Question? Forty years ago the Devon Commission inquired into the state of that question; but it remained unsettled, and 30 years elapsed before any steps were taken to improve the condition of the tenantry of Ireland, though that condition was declared by the Devon Commission to be a scandal to the civilized world. I think that there was one part of the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer which will astonish some of the people of Belfast. The noble Lord announced the determination of the Government to put down rioting in Belfast, by whomsoever committed. The Orangemen of Belfast may well upbraid the noble Lord for that determination, for he himself is the really guilty party in the matter. The noble Lord told the Orangemen of Belfast that they had privileges worth fighting for. He told them to "charge with all their chivalry." He told them to fight, and they would be right; and, no doubt, when the Ulster Orangemen went out to sack a public-house, they thought they were carrying out the mandate of the noble Lord, and charging with all their chivalry. "Charge, Ulster, charge; charge with all your chivalry," was the command of the noble Lord. The Ulster men have carried out that command; and now the noble Lord, instead of commending their action, has actually the ingratitude, in reference to what has occurred in Belfast during the last two months, to threaten them with the consequences. I sincerely hope that some effort will be made to produce the noble Lord before the Belfast Royal Commission, and make him explain his conduct six months ago, when he went down to Belfast and incited the Orangemen there to engage in the riots that have lately taken place, so that it may be thoroughly known that no man, even if he be a Minister of the Crown, may in future endeavour to accomplish political objects by inciting others to commit crime. We have heard to-night something about the rents in Ireland, and the noble Lord made an astonishing assertion that there was nothing whatever in what we have heard about the fall in the price of produce, and that all rents will be paid if the landlords are afforded adequate means for their collection. I do not think the noble Lord can have read the evidence which has been given upon this subject; and I should like to refresh the memories of hon. Members by recalling to their recollection the testimony given by a very high authority only a few months ago. I mean Sir James Caird. The Times, anxious to back Sir James Caird up, described him as a man whose authority upon agricultural questions was universally recognized. In his letter to The Times, dated March 20, 1886, Sir James Caird says—

"The land in Ireland is held by two distinct classes of tenants—the small farmers, who pay rent from £1 to £20; and the comparatively large farmers, who pay rent from £20 upwards. Of the first class there are 538,000 holdings, averaging £6 each; of the second class, 121,000 holdings, averaging £56 each. The rent payable by the first class is £3,572,000; and by the second class, £6,845,000. Five-sixths of the Irish tenants thus pay about one-third of the total rental, and one-sixth pay nearly two-thirds. If the present price of agricultural produce continue, I should fear that, from the land held by the large body of poor farmers in Ireland, any economical rent has for the present disappeared."

So said Sir James Caird, whom The Times acknowledges to be a very high authority on agricultural questions, and whom The Times backed up by saying—

"It is not too much to say that the rental of the 538,000 holdings is practically irrecoverable by anybody, whether landlord, English Government, or Irish Government."

We do not go so far as this, but if Sir James Caird's assertion were of any value some months ago, it ought not to be utterly discredited now. Sir, the tenants of Ireland are anxious to pay their rents, no matter what may be stated to the contrary. They know that unless they do so notices of eviction will be the result, and that they will be forced to quit the holdings which they love, and be deprived of the homes which they have inherited for generations from their forefathers. There is no other industry they can pursue than the industry they are now following. It is impossible, however, to get blood out of a stone, and you cannot exact from tenants what they are unable to pay. Therefore, no matter what means the Government take to exact these rents, failure will be the result, and you will only create the same state of things which prevailed in 1881 and 1882, when turbulence, disorder, and crime reigned throughout the country, and was made the pretext for the passing of a stringent Coercion Act. Probably this is the end at which the Government are now aiming. If it is, they may possibly succeed in their object; but they will not succeed in bringing the question any nearer to a solution, nor in making British rule better liked by the Irish people. By the time they have done they will find that they have made the situation much worse, and they will eventually feel themselves compelled to return to a policy of coercion, which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition so strongly denounced. The House has been told that the decision of the country on Irish matters is final. I certainly fail to see where the finality is. We have often heard it said with regard to other Irish questions that the end of the Irish movement has been reached. We have been told on every occasion on which we sought to remedy the grievances of Ireland that the country had decided against us, and that this House had decided against us; but we have lived to see this House reverse its own decrees and become converted to the views of the minority. Having some personal experience in the matter, and participated to some extent in the contests which recently took place in the South of England, I have no hesitation in declaring that I do not believe one single word of this declaration about finality. We have had in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) the support of nearly 2,500,000 of the electors of the United Kingdom; while hon. Members opposite, with their finality, have only had the support of 280,000 more. If only 80,000 Liberals had voted against the Tory Party, and had not deserted their own colours by assisting to return Tories to this House, it is we who would have been entitled to say that the decision of the country, taken finally and irrevocably, was in favour of self-government for Ireland. [A laugh.] I see that an hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House laughs at that statement; but I believe that he is one of those who have been entitled to take their seats in this House by virtue of the help which they received from the Liberal Party. I firmly believe that the electors of the country voted in ignorance of the true state of the case. I never went anywhere without seeing the most enormous lies put forth everywhere; published in placards and in newspapers, and shouted from platforms, not only by speakers of the Orange stamp, but by the candidates themselves. On the other side, in too many instances, not one word was spoken or written to explain the true nature of the Irish Question. The Irish Question has been grossly misrepresented. I believe that as soon as the true state of the case is explained and the truth is made apparent to the minds of the English people we may look with confidence to the early triumph of our cause. In the meantime we are prepared to struggle on to the end, working sincerely and heartily for the establishment of a National Parliament in our country. All I can say to hon. Members opposite is this—that, so far as the Irish National movement is concerned, we are determined to extend our movement to England, in order to instruct the English people and tell them the truth, which has hitherto been obscured from their vision by lies and misrepresentation. I have listened with attention to the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I have been unable to discover in it any germ of a policy which honest men can support. The sole object of the Government seems to be to stick to their places and enjoy their salaries. They hope to be able to do that the more readily by placing the Irish Question in the hands of Royal Commissioners. I presume they will take as long a time as possible before they appoint these Commissions; and if only six months elapse thousands of pounds will have been pocketed by Tory placemen, and large additions will have been made to the pensions on the Civil List. Probably, after their long servitude in the shades of Opposition, we ought not to grudge them a short period of power and enjoyment; but their reign will come to an end, and that sooner, perhaps, than they expect.

Mr. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire, : Sir, it is the characteristic of Queen's Speeches in general that neither in form nor in substance are they productions at all worthy of the lofty source from which they purport to emanate; and I think that on the present occasion the Queen's Speech to which we have listened has not proved an exception to the general rule. I do not think that it is a circumstance altogether to be wondered at. Queen's Speeches have reference rather to the pledges of the past than to the promises of the future. They are given to the world at a period when the policy of the Government to which they belong is in a condition of incubation rather than of maturity; and it is not to be expected that any Government would put forward at such a time a policy yet in an inchoate state, and allow it to appear with any distinctness or detail. The circumstances in which the Government which has just been returned at the polling booths came into Office are circumstances of exceptional difficulty, and make the condition of things to which I have just referred, in regard to the Queen's Speech, far from unnatural. We have reason to believe—indeed, we have heard it from the noble Lord the Leader of this House—that the Government have to grapple with no difficulty of any great magnitude excepting that which faces them in Ireland. Certainly, that is a difficulty before which the courage of any man might well pale. It is a difficulty which is said by some of the political opponents of the Party to which I belong to be a difficulty of our creation. I believe that it is a difficulty of our creation. I glory in the fact. I believe that the policy initiated by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) is a policy which has brought about a complete change in the spirit of our treatment of Irish questions. I do not glory in that fact because it has produced embarrassment to hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I glory in it because it has, once for all, put an end to that policy of dawdle—that policy of do-nothing—which has hitherto characterized our treatment of Irish questions during the present century. At last we have come to a point at which it is absolutely necessary to take a stand. The policy inaugurated by the right hon. Gentleman may have been a bad one—I say nothing at all about that—but at all events it was a policy. The country has rejected it. However sorry we may be on some grounds that it has been rejected, there are circumstances connected with the matter for which, on other grounds, we have no cause to be sorry; and we should not be true to our trust if we did not rejoice that the people have had an opportunity of expressing, in a Constitutional manner, their opinion on the policy submitted to them. Now, Sir, I do not believe that that opinion has been finally expressed. I venture humbly to differ from the Prime Minister and the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to think that the verdict of the country has been given in a partial manner only, and has reference merely to the particular policy then before the country. I doubt very much whether the country, or even those voters who recorded their votes at the last Election, had distinctly made up their minds against the principle of a Home Rule policy. Probably, if ever a policy of Home Rule is again brought forward in this House—and I believe that it will be before very long—it will assume a form differing somewhat from that in which it was submitted by the late Government; but it will embody and adhere to the principle of a separate Parliament for Ireland. It may be that in the particular form of the provisions of the Act which is to create that separate Parliament, taught by experience, something may be devised for the better conciliation of the prejudices of the English people. In the meantime, we have to face the fact that such a policy is not the policy of Her Majesty's Government now. That line of thought is one which the country has ordered us no longer to seek to pursue; and those of us who are in Opposition—at any rate, a large section of those who sit around me—who think with myself will, I am sure, seek as far as we can, consistently with our opinions, conscientiously to support Her Majesty's Government—a Government chosen by the country to carry on the important business of directing the affairs of the country. I have stated that the Queen's Speech does not tell us much about the Irish Question; but we have had an amplification of the statement contained in the Speech from the lips of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Lord certainly did not tell us very much. In a number of important particulars the only proposal of the Government seems to be a desire to devolve the responsibilities of Her Majesty's Government upon a series of Royal Commissions. It does not even appear that we have heard the last of these Royal Commissions. There may be more of them. It is quite reasonable that Her Majesty's Ministers should take time to consider the policy they ought to adopt, and undoubtedly it may be that the plan of inquiry which has been foreshadowed is a plan which would not only give Ministers time, but give them access to sources of information which they would not otherwise possess. That may be the case; but, undoubtedly, these references to the policy of the future point to a course very different from any scheme which might be laid down now for the settlement of the Irish Question on the lines of the Bill which was before the country at the last Election. There can be no doubt that the mandate given to the Liberal Party in December last has been withdrawn; but on what lines are the present Government to pursue the policy which has been vaguely indicated to-night? There are several difficulties in their way. There was very little that was definite given by way of instruction to their followers during the Election, and probably their followers will find that they have committed themselves to all sorts of inconvenient pledges. Within the limits of the noble Lord's speech three provisions have been foreshadowed. The Government propose to deal with the question of social order in Ireland, with the question of land, and with the question of local government. Now, taking these as their standpoint, it is perfectly plain that by local government, having regard to the pledges which the noble Lord has allowed his followers to give, it is impossible that he can mean anything more than a policy of parochialism. It is impossible that he can mean to give any large measure of control of affairs purely Irish to Irish hands. If the noble Lord meant to do that he would find himself fettered and hampered by the pledges which he has allowed his followers to give. Then there is the question of the land. How is the Land Question to be dealt with on anything like a large scale? I venture to say that two-thirds of the hon. Members who sit opposite to me have given pledges to their constituents which preclude them from consenting to any of the public funds being invested on the security of Irish land. Nevertheless, I gathered from the speech of the noble Lord that it is contemplated, at some future day, that the Imperial Exchequer shall make large advances on the security of the Irish land. Then, as to the third question—namely, that of social order—it is evident that Her Majesty's Ministers mean to separate it from the two other questions. The noble Lord spoke of social order as if it could be disassociated from the question of local government. But it was a cardinal principle in the treatment of the Irish problem by the late Government that the question of social order was so inextricably bound up with the other two questions that it was only upon the principle of dealing with the three together that they could effectually grapple with the question of social order, and get fairly at its root. It may be that the late Government were wrong; but at all events the noble Lord, in proposing to separate the question of social order from the other two questions of the land and of local government, gives a distinct negative to the policy of the late Government. Allow me to glance at the question of local government. It is all very well to talk of local government; but if hon. Members will go to the South of Ireland, and especially to the county of Kerry, they will find that the discontented peasantry are making use of those weapons of local government which they have already in their hands for the purpose of embarrassing the classes which are obnoxious to them. They are making use of those weapons to punish landlords on the one hand, and to assist evicted tenants on the other. If, with the limited powers of local government they now possess, they can do that, what will they do if you put in their hands the more extended powers which the noble Lord states will, in the course of a few months, be given to them? As regards the question of the restoration of social order, the noble Lord proposes not to go to the root of the matter, and to treat the question as a political and an agrarian one, but to deal with it as one of police; and he seems to have persuaded a gallant officer, well known to the public, to undertake the post of Chief Inspector of Local Constabulary in the county of Kerry. When Sir Redvers Buller gets there, is it intended that he shall institute martial law? If he is not going to do that, what is he to do? Her Majesty's Government may say that they are sending him there for the purpose of inquiry; but what about the state of social order in the coming winter; what about the condition of those unfortunate landlords who will have to bear the brunt of the inaction of the Government? Whatever may have been the demerits of our policy, it was one which sought to give the landlords the power of getting themselves bought out. But the policy of the noble Lord proposes nothing of the sort, at least for some time to come. I venture to think, Sir, that in the present state of the public mind, and in the condition in which it was at the last Election, those electors who cast their votes in the Conservative interest would have been willing to strengthen the hands of the Prime Minister had he courageously announced that he proposed to carry into effect the intention shadowed forth in his Opera House speech, but afterwards explained away in the House of Lords. You may explain away the existing state of things as much as you like; but if you are to undertake a policy of repression you may depend upon it that you will require all those powers of coercion which were alluded to by implication in the speech of the Prime Minister in the Opera House. I believe that if the Conservative Party had had the courage of their convictions at the last Election they could have secured a majority in this House. As it is, they are fettered by the pledges they were induced to give, and by the declarations which they have made against coercion, and by the refusal on the part of hon. Members who sit on these Benches to allow the public money to be spent in buying out the landlords. In consequence of the course they were induced to take then they now find themselves placed in a position which must in future prove a position of great difficulty. No doubt, it is a characteristic of the Conservative Party that they always hold more together, and are more obedient to their Leaders, than the rank and file of the Party to which I have the honour to belong; and it may be that in the course of time the policy denounced upon the hustings will be acknowledged as the necessary and only policy of the Conservative Party. It may be that the Royal Commissions may report in favour of the absolute necessity of a system of land purchase, and also of some system which could only be described as one of coercion; and no doubt, if they did so, it might be found possible for Her Majesty's Government to secure a large amount of support to that policy. For my own part, I cannot altogether regret that the Liberal Party are now out of power, and compelled to fill the office of critics. That is a duty which becomes the duty of every patriotic Opposition. At the same time, it is likewise our duty to give what support we can, consistently with our opinions, to Her Majesty's Ministers in carrying on the Government of the country. There were signs before the last General Election that the confidence of the country was being withdrawn from the Liberal Party; and I do not think that its defeat at the last General Election was entirely due to the Home Rule policy. There were signs that the confidence of the country was being withdrawn from us just as it was withdrawn from us in 1874, and as it was withdrawn from the Conservatives in 1880. It has always been found that after a certain period of the enjoyment of power a political Party loses popularity. That popularity is gradually on the wane until it culminates in defeat; and it was due to causes such as this that we have now lost those East End of London constituencies, which appear to be adapted, by their indifferent and easily influenced tendencies, for recognition as a kind of political barometer. Until we have regained the support of such people I, for my part, do not desire to see the Liberal Party again in power; but when they do come back, I hope they will come back with sufficient strength once for all to settle the Home Rule Question on the lines indicated in the recent proposals. I believe that we shall come back before very long, and when it will have been abundantly proved that the policy of those who now sit opposite to us has altogether failed. In the meanwhile, we have no desire to inaugurate a factious opposition. We shall seek to do our duty to the country. We accept the opinion which the country has expressed, and we are prepared to support the Government wherever we can conscientiously support them, always provided that the votes we give are in accordance with the opinions we have expressed, and in harmony with the pledges we have given.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor,)—put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—COMPLAINTS AS TO QUALITY OF FIELD OR MOUNTAIN GUNS.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any and what complaints have been received by the War Office, during the last five years, from General Officers commanding in the presence of the enemy, as to the quality of the field or mountain guns, or their carriages, lights, or ammunition, as supplied to the troops under their command; whether any and what complaints have been made, during the same period, to the Civil Department of the War Office by the Military Departments of the same Office; and, whether, in each case, if any such complaints have been made, he will lay them upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Yes, Sir; complaints have been made by General Officers, in the course of the last five years, on the points mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member. General Officers are invited, and required, to make these complaints, which are examined by the Department at home, in order that the Service may benefit by experience gained in the field of any possible errors of manufacture or of administration; but I am unable to lay those Papers on the Table, as it would be injurious to the public interests that statements made in the most complete confidence and good faith should be published to the world without fuller explanation than could be given in a Return; and such a publication would have the effect of deterring officers from the full and free expression of their views which the War Office invites.

ARMY—CHARGES AGAINST THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to institute any judicial inquiry, by means of a Royal Commission or otherwise, into the charges brought by Colonel Hope and others against the Ordnance Department?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) asked that the Question might be postponed till Monday.

PARLIAMENT—THE COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What course the Government intend to take on the Report of the Committee on Procedure, and if they are prepared to recommend its adoption?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): In reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question I would state, without wishing to commit the Government in such a manner as might embarrass them in the event of the occurrence of unforeseen eventualities, but subject always to that qualification, that it would be the desire of the Government to ask the House to proceed with vigour and energy, when it meets next Session, with the consideration of the reform of the Procedure of the House of Commons, as deliberated upon by the Committee of the last Parliament. With regard to the second portion of the Question, whether we are prepared to recommend the adoption of the Report, the Government, of course, will be quite prepared to offer that as a basis for the consideration of the House, and also to state their general approval of its conclusions. But probably, like all other Reports of Committees, it would be open to some improvements by the general sense of the House.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE— THE HESSIAN FLY.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he has any official information as to the reported appearance of the Hessian Fly in parts of Essex and Hertfordshire; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government are taking steps with the view of warning farmers generally, and stamping out this agricultural pest?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): No notice has been taken, in the Reports received up to this time from the collectors of the Agricultural Returns in either Essex or Hertfordshire, as to destruction of wheat by Hessian fly. Mr. Whitehead, who has prepared some extremely valuable Reports for the Agricultural Department on the subject of insects injurious to crops, states in his letter to The Times of the 18th instant that the Hessian fly is of the same genus as the wheat midge, to which he has referred in his Report No. 2, issued by the Privy Council in December last. I have directed a letter to be written to Mr. Whitehead asking him whether he can suggest any short and simple instructions which it may be useful to issue to the Local Authorities of any districts which may become affected by this pest. I may add that the Royal Agricultural Society have called attention to the possible danger, and have suggested means of prevention.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—SHELTER IN PALACE YARD.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassetlaw) asked the First Commissioner of Works, If, before the meeting of Parliament next year, he will provide such suitable protection from the weather for Members alighting at or departing from the House, as well as for both public and private vehicles in waiting in Palace Yard, as is provided at all principal railway stations?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I shall do what I can to provide protection from the weather for Members alighting at or departing from the House; but I fear that it will be very difficult to devise any shelter for public or private vehicles which would not seriously disfigure the Court Yard.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES— THE FISHERY DISPUTE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What measures are being adopted between

Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the purpose of bringing about an amicable settlement of those differences which have arisen regarding the Canadian fishery regulations; and, whether it is intended to appoint a joint Commission of the two Countries for the purpose of amending the Treaty of 1818?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.) (who replied, said: Communications are now passing between the two Governments with a view to effect a friendly settlement of the questions which have arisen in connection with the North American Fisheries. The negotiations, which have been conducted in communication with the Government of Canada, have not yet reached such a stage as would make it desirable to indicate the exact steps which may be taken by the two Governments in the matter.

TRUCK ACTS—THE EASDALE SLATE COMPANY.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, If it is true, as stated by The Oban Times, that the workmen in the employ of the Easdale Slate Company are paid their wages partly in money and partly in goods; and, if the system in operation there is an infringement of the Truck Acts?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities), in reply, said, that he had not yet been able to obtain any facts in regard to the matter, and he would be glad if the hon. Member would postpone his Question.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL—LICENCES FOR SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government, either in their Local Government Bill or otherwise, to propose legislation altering the conditions under which licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors are obtainable?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S. : The hon. Gentleman asks me a Question which it is rather difficult for me to answer in a manner which may be satisfactory to him. It is quite impossible for me to indicate to the House, with any kind of precision, what will be the contents of the Local Government Bill which the Government hope to introduce next Session. But, speaking generally, I suppose I may say this—that it would be almost impossible, I imagine, to eliminate, to any considerable extent, from the consideration of the question of local government, the consideration of the subsidiary question of the licensing power with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors.

NAVY—H.M.S. "IMPERIEUSE."

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the new armour-belted cruiser Imperieuse at Portsmouth, now fitting for trial at sea, Whether it is a fact that when her stores are all on board she will be immersed three feet deeper than her design warrants, and her armour-belt entirely under water; whether her torpedo lower portsills will then be flush with the water, and her armoured deck in the same position; whether she was designed to have three feet of armoured free-board, which has thus been destroyed; whether she was designed to carry 1,100 tons of coal, which has since, under the circumstances, been reduced to 900 tons; whether the ship is to be sent to sea in the condition described, with her stability thus seriously affected, and her efficiency as a seaworthy fighting ship destroyed; whether the cost of hull and machinery amounts in round numbers to £485,000; whether there is reason to fear that similar errors may exist in the designs of the other belted cruisers now in course of building; and, whether he will cause strict inquiry to be made with a view to ascertaining upon whom really rests the responsibility?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The alleged difference between the actual and designed draught of the Imperieuse has been carefully investigated by the present Board of Admiralty, and we have ascertained that—(1) when the ship is complete with all her stores and coal on board, as designed, she will be 11½ inches deeper than her original designed line. This is due to known additions of weight of armament, machinery, &c., which have been accepted during the building of the ship, by which her speed has been increased to 17 knots as against 16 knots in the design. (2) In this condition the height of the three torpedo ports (lower edge) will be respectively—forward, 2 feet 10½ inches; amidships, 3 feet 2½ inches; aft, 2 feet 4½ inches. The height of the armour or belt deck will be 2 feet 3½ inches. (3) She was designed to have 3 feet 3 inches armoured freeboard, and this has been reduced, as above stated, to 2 feet 3½ inches. (4) She was designed to carry 400 tons of coal (as an average quantity) at her normal draught, with power to stow 900 tons when required. In subsequently settling the details of internal arrangements, it has been found possible to stow as much as 1,130 tons. Any quantity carried beyond the 400 tons of course means increased immersion. The extra immersion due to carrying 900 tons of coal is 14 inches beyond the 11½ inches above stated, or 2 feet 1½ inches. (5) The ship is to be sent to sea for an experimental cruise in company with the Colossus, starting with 900 tons of coal. The designers are quite satisfied with the stability, which is not at all appreciably affected by the increase of draught. (6) The cost of hull and machinery is about £485,000. (7) The sister ship Warspite will be in the same position. The Constructors' Department inform me that there is no reason to anticipate that the other belted cruisers will exceed their designed draught.

NAVY—ORDNANCE—THE 38-TON GUNS OF H.M.S. "AJAX."

COLONEL HUGHEN-HALLETT (Rochester, asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as recently stated in The Admiralty and Horse Guards Gazette, that practice with the four 38-ton muzzle-loading guns on board H.M.S. Ajax off the coast of Spain, had to be stopped in consequence of defective construction at the vents, which rendered practice dangerous; whether any Report thereon from the Admiral, or from the Captain of the Ship, has been received; and, whether he will lay it upon the Table?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord George Hamilton) (Middlesex, Ealing) (who replied) said: It is true that practice from the 38-ton guns of the Ajax was temporarily stopped in consequence of defects in connection with the vents. The guns have been thoroughly overhauled since the return of the ship to England by the officers of the War Department, who have reported that, owing to the nuts which secure the axial vents not having been properly tightened up, a small escape of gas had taken place, slightly eroding the steel of the gun tubes where the vent passes through them. These slight defects have been repaired, and the guns are now perfectly efficient and serviceable. Instructions have been issued to insure the proper tightening up of the screws in future.

POOR LAW—FLOGGING AT THE HANWELL PAUPER SCHOOLS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report in The Times of the 18th instant, of the last meeting of the City of London Board of Guardians, when mention was made of a case of cruel treatment of an inmate of the Hanwell Pauper Schools, and the Chairman of the Board stated that "He was convinced that there was an unnecessary amount of flogging at the Hanwell Schools:"

and, whether he will cause proper inquiry to be made as to the truth of this allegation?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention was drawn to the report in question, and I have directed that an explanation be called for from the drill master, whose conduct is in question. The Managers of the School District have also been asked for their observations as to the case, and as to the allegation that there is an unnecessary amount of flogging at the school. On receipt of the replies I shall take such action as may seem to me to be necessary. I may say that the regulations laid down at these schools as to corporal punishment are very strict, and that in no case, and under no circumstances, had the drill master any authority for inflicting corporal punishment.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND—LAW ADVISER TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the

Lord George Hamilton

Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether an appointment has been made, or is intended to be made, to the office of Law Adviser to the Lord Lieutenant?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): No, Sir.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE BELFAST RIOTS COMMISSION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can inform the House of the names of the two Members added to the Commission on the Belfast riots? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would also say whether it is intended to ask Parliament to give powers to the Commission to order the attendance of witnesses as well as to administer oaths?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): That Question will depend upon the power that may be given to the Commissioners to administer the oath. With regard to the first Question of the hon. Member, I think I stated yesterday that I did not anticipate that I should be able to answer it to-day, and I would ask him to repeat it on Monday; but I have said nothing to imply that two Commissioners will be added to the Commission. It is necessary that a Judicial Commission of the kind should be small in number.

In reply to Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne),

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said: I did not intend yesterday to convey that the extension of the scope of the Commission would be of an important character. Of course, the scope of the Commission would be extended so as to include inquiry into the riots in August, as well as the previous riots. There are two other alterations, possibly of some little importance, which will be made in it, with a view rather to clear up the meaning of the Commission than to extend it. The proceedings and action taken by the magistrates will be interpreted to include the proceedings and action taken by either stipendiary or local magistrates; and the circumstances of the riots will be interpreted to include the origin of the riots and the causes of their continuance.

MR. SEXTON inquired whether the term "origin of the riots" would be held to include the present constitution and condition of the Orange Society?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir; I should think not.

RUSSIA—RUMOURED OCCUPATION OF PORT LAZAREFF.

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact, as reported, that the Russian Government have occupied Port Lazareff in the Corea; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take for the protection of British interests in the China seas?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The report referred to is probably a telegram from Pekin, which appeared in The Times on the 17th of July, that the Russian Fleet was threatening Port Lazareff. Her Majesty's Government have received no confirmation of that report, and Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg was informed by M. de Giers, on the 25th of July, that there was no foundation for the statement.

ARMY—MANUFACTURE OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, &c.

MAJOR GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will give instructions that the arms, ammunition, and equipment required for the Army shall be of Home Manufacture and not be obtained from abroad?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said, that, as far as was practicable, the arms and equipments of home manufacturers would be preferred; but there were some Army necessities which we were not yet in a position to supply ourselves with, and which we were at present compelled to buy abroad. But, as far as possible, home manufactures would be preferred.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—BILLS OF PRIVATE MEMBERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Perhaps the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be good enough to say, Whether he contemplates adjourning the debate at an early hour, in order to enable hon. Members who have given Notice of Bills an opportunity of moving their introduction?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I should be very anxious, on any proposal of that kind, to consult the convenience of the House; and if there were any general desire on the part of the House to adjourn the debate again early to-night—by which, I suppose, is meant about 12 o'clock—the Government would be very ready to accede to it. But, perhaps, with the permission of the House, I may take this opportunity of stating the views of the Government with regard generally to the Notices of Motion, either as respects Committees or Bills, which have been given Notice of by private Members. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that it would be desirable, in the interests of hon. Members individually and generally, to limit the Business of Parliament solely to questions of finance, and to legislation which is indissolubly connected with questions of finance. That being so, we think that it would be extremely inconvenient that the progress of financial measures should be at all interfered with, or should be at all mixed up with questions of private legislation. The Government, therefore, after due consideration, deem it would be for the best, and that they will be acting most for the convenience of hon. Members, if they take on themselves the responsibility of placing Notices of opposition to all the private Members' Bills, and Notices of Motion, which are down on the Order Paper. Of course, the Government would much regret if any construction other than that I have stated were placed upon their action, or if it were supposed by any hon. Member who is interested in any particular Bill that the Government, by such action, committed themselves to any kind of expression of opinion as to the particular Bill which happened to receive Notice of opposition.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the noble Lord agree to refer all these Bills and Notices to a Royal Commission?

Mr. Labouchere

MOTION.

NEW WRIT—DOUBLE RETURN FOR BELFAST BOROUGH (WESTERN DIVISION) AND SLIGO COUNTY (SOUTHERN DIVISION).

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): I beg to move—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the Southern Division of the County of Sligo in the room of Thomas Sexton, Esq., who having been returned for both the Southern Division of the County of Sligo and the Western Division of Belfast has elected to serve for the Western Division of Belfast."

In making that Motion I should like to say—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That Motion cannot properly be made, and I decline to put it from the Chair, for this reason—that there is no vacancy for the Southern Division of Sligo, and there can be none. The hon. Gentleman was returned for the Southern Division of the County of Sligo and for the Western Division of the Borough of Belfast; and in the early days of the Session—the first or second day—he gave me notice that he elected to sit for one of those constituencies. I replied to him at the time that he was not in a position to make his election, for the reason that a Petition had been presented against his return for one of those constituencies. In my opinion, a Member cannot elect to choose which of the two constituencies he shall sit for until he has been duly returned for both of them. In this case he has not been duly returned for both of them, because his return for one of them is still sub judice; and it is an old and a very well-established and well-known practice of this House that until there is no question as to the return of a Member for either of the constituencies for which he is returned he is not able to make his choice of either. When I gave that advice to the hon. Gentleman, and told him I could not put the Motion or read his letter in which he elected to serve for one of these constituencies from the Chair, I was acting upon the precedent of Mr. O'Connell in 1841, who, having been returned for the two constituencies of Meath and Cork, gave a letter to the Speaker which was read from the Chair, in which he elected to serve for one of those constituencies.

The Speaker then stated that a Petition having been lodged against the return of the hon. Gentleman, Mr. O'Connell, for one of those constituencies, he was not in a position to make his election. Acting upon that precedent, and on the uniform practice of 100 years and long before that period, I declined to read the letter from the Chair in which the hon. Gentleman made his election; and I shall now, in the exercise of my discretion—subject, of course, to the will of the House, and after having given the best attention I could to the matter—decline to put the Motion to the House.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S. : Perhaps you will allow me, Sir, to ask you whether you attach any weight to the consideration that in the case of Mr. O'Connell the seat for Cork, which he desired to take, was claimed in the Petition, whereas the seat for West Belfast is not claimed?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that that alters the view of the case. The words of the Standing Order are so expressed that if a Member is returned for two places he cannot elect to sit for either until there is no question of his return for both of them. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the consideration which the hon. Gentleman has stated as to whether the seat is claimed on Petition does not make any difference of principle.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): As a point of Order, I should like to ask you which place the hon. Gentleman sits for now?

MR. SPEAKER: It is a well-understood Rule of the House that if a Member is returned for two places he can sit; but for which place the hon. Member is now sitting it is impossible for me to say until the Court has decided upon his return.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—HOURS OF COMMENCEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord Randolph Churchill) (Paddington, S. : I beg to suggest to the House that, as there is no Private Business before the House at the present period of the year, it might be convenient for us to commence Business at a quarter-past instead of half-past 4 o'clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th August.]—[See page 96.]

Debate resumed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Many of the objections which have been felt by us (the Irish Members) to the terseness of the Queen's Speech have been considerably removed by the character of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill). The noble Lord's speech was one of the most remarkable that has ever been delivered in this House. It was full, clear, and was, I think, the most significant expression of the policy of the Government; and I shall suggest some reasons why, in my opinion, Members, especially on this of the House, will be wanting in their duty to their constituents if they do not subject that speech to the most searching and prompt criticism and discussion. Before I advert to the policy of the Government, let me congratulate the noble Lord on the fact that he is in the grand position of being entirely independent of the support of the Orange tail of the Tory Party in this House. We endeavoured to bring the Tory Party into that position last November. We did not succeed. The Liberal Unionists have succeeded where we failed, and they have made the noble Lord entirely independent even of the hon. and gallant Colonel the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), whose patronage he found so unwelcome. The noble Lord has not been slow to inform the House of his emancipation. There was almost a scream of liberty and exultation in the emphasis with which the noble Lord separated himself from the Orange Party. He gave warning, in terms of unmistakable and admirable clearness, to the rioters of Belfast that, even although they did belong to the Orange brethren, they would be required to desist from murder and plunder even by a Tory Administration. The noble Lord must have been very pleased to have been able to turn his back on the Orange Party with such rapidity and emphasis, and to give the world another remarkable proof of that versatility which is one of his greatest characteristics. But, although we are bound to congratulate the noble Lord on his liberation, we cannot forget some of the incidents in connection with the Orange riots, and the speeches of the Orangemen of Belfast. I do not want to raise any controversy with regard to the past, which can be buried with decency and decorum; but the noble Lord cannot have been surprised at the laughter with which the statement was received on these Benches—that the Government intend to make a searching inquiry into the origin of the Belfast riots. The origin of the Belfast riots goes pretty far back, but I will not go further back than this—that the speeches of the noble Lord are the real origin of them. When we read those appalling accounts of men murdering their fellow-men in the name of religion, of men plundering houses and attacking women and children, we cannot forget that this is a rude translation into fact by the Orangemen of Ulster of those appeals which came from the noble Lord. The noble Lord spoke of the loss of 25 lives. I have no hesitation in saying that every man who has lost his life in those riots was a dupe and a victim of the noble Lord. Unfortunately, the bad example of the noble Lord was followed by some Members of his Party, and, I regret to say, by some Members even of Liberal Party. In the last Parliament the Orangemen of Belfast were told that the moment a shot was fired against them the sympathy of this country would be on their side. It was language like that which encouraged the Orangemen to shoot down not merely their fellow-subjects, but also the armed forces of the Crown. We cannot forget that an hon. Gentleman otherwise unknown to fame, who now sits for Aston Manor (Mr. Kynoch) announced, during his Election campaign, that he was willing to supply as many rifles and cartridges as the Orangemen required. I do not know if the hon. Gentleman was as good as his word; but what would be the feelings of this House if they should discover that some of the cartridges and rifles found in the streets of Belfast were supplied by a Tory Member? The noble Lord gave us a most charming picture of the state of Ireland. Everything seems to be going on very well except in Belfast and the county of Kerry. But how does that picture contrast with the one which appeared in Tory speeches and addresses during the General Election? Several of the hon. Gentlemen on those Benches declared to the constituencies of England that in Ireland murder and crime were stalking unchecked through the land, life was entirely insecure, and there was such a state of anarchy that it required a resolute Government which knew its own mind and did not require to resort to Commissions. If the state of Ireland is as Tory candidates described it at the General Election, the Government are criminally responsible in delaying one hour in bringing in legislation to put an end to it; but if that description made to the country was false and incorrect, then the noble Lord, or some other Member of the Tory Party, ought to get up and apologize to the people of Ireland for having slandered them, and to the people of England for having deceived them. The noble Lord informs us that one of his many Commissions is to inquire into "Boycotting" and intimidation in Ireland, and that the "sign post," the general basis of the Government policy with regard to Ireland, is that between Ireland and England there should be similarity and equality and simultaneity. Very well. But if there is to be a Commission to inquire into intimidation and "Boycotting," then it ought to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom; not merely into the proceedings of the National League in Ireland, but also into the proceedings of the Primrose League in England. During the last Election in England, "Boycotting" and intimidation were carried on by the Tory Party to an extent unprecedented and unparalleled; and so much was this the case, that I think I represent almost the consensus of opinion, at least among the Liberal Party, in saying that the question was being seriously considered whether they should not require a large change in the electoral legislation of this country; whether they were not bound to protect the labourer from requests that amounted to commands from his landlord, the shopkeeper from the visits of the dames and squires of the Primrose League, who accompanied a request for votes with threats of a removal of custom; and further whether, in order to secure anything approaching freedom of election, canvassing should not be made entirely illegal. Therefore, I say that if the noble Lord will only apply his principle of similarity and equality and simultaneity, we shall welcome the Commission. What is the policy of the Government? The hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded the Address (Mr. Maclean) summed it up with great simplicity—all the Government had to do was to follow the old French saying—“J’y suis; J’y reste;” as if the duty of Ministers was confined to drawing their quarter’s salary. The Government seemed satisfied to pursue a policy of that description; but I should expect that even a Tory Ministry supposes it is sent into Office to redress grievances and remove abuses. The hon. and learned Gentleman to whom I have just alluded said that the verdict of the constituencies was final and irrevocable on the point that the Union in its existing form should be maintained. That proposition I entirely deny; and also that we have on these Benches a certain number of Gentlemen called Liberal Unionists, and that they went to the constituencies on the cry that the Union, in its existing form, should be maintained. Was it not their cry, rather, that they were in favour of large modifications of the existing Union? They only stopped short at the point reached by the Prime Minister’s proposals. Aye, even Members of the Tory Party went considerable lengths in their demand for modification. As a matter of fact, there is not a section of this House which was elected on the principle of maintaining the Union in its existing position; and several sections of the House were elected on the distinct principle of making ample modifications. The hon. and learned Gentleman, first having mistaken the character of the verdict, went on, as I before observed, most mistakenly to say that it was final and irrevocable. The main charge against the late Prime Minister was that he had sprung Home Rule on the country, giving it little time to consider and discuss the proposal. But the Home Rule scheme was subject to the strong opposition of the united Tory Party, and to the misfortune of a divided and disrupted Liberal Party; and, in addition to that combination against it, the evil effect of the coupling with it the system of land purchase; and it is to the hatred and dislike of the system of land purchase proposed, or, rather, the hatred of the Irish landlords, which is now as prominent in English as in Irish feeling, that much may be laid for the defeat of Home Rule. In reference to this matter, I would call the attention of the House to the astonishing character of the vote in favour of the late Prime Minister—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. There were 1,338,718 votes in agreement with the scheme, and the voting against the policy amounted to 1,416,472. And, Sir, I would venture to say that never was a great proposal of Reform, under circumstances of so much difficulty, accorded such a large amount of support. Well, the decision of the country is final and irrevocable say hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side; but, Sir, what did the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) commit himself to in reference to this matter—to the statement that any policy of Reform which was accepted by the majority of the Liberal Party, although it might be temporarily postponed, yet it could never be finally defeated. Will the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, or any man in this House, venture to contend that the policy of the late Prime Minister was rejected by the majority of the constituencies, and was not accepted by the overwhelming majority of the Liberal Party? Therefore, I say, Sir, acting upon the example of the noble Marquess, Home Rule, though rejected by the majority of the constituencies, is accepted by the majority of the Liberal Party in England. The late Prime Minister’s policy may be postponed; but the verdict against it is not final or irrevocable, and the verdict that has been given, Sir, is one which very soon will be entirely reversed. Furthermore, the question of Home Rule was voted upon by England, by Scotland, by Wales, and by Ireland. Scotland decided in favour of it; Wales decided in favour of it; Ireland decided in favour of it—that is to say, three out of the four countries decided in favour of it, and but one country gave a vote against it, and that not of a very excessive character; and I think, Sir, it is a little too sanguine on the part of the Tory Party to assume that the policy which three out of four countries largely supported is a policy finally and irrevocably defeated. A point, Sir, entirely forgotten apparently is that the question put to the constituencies was simply the question how Ireland should be governed; and I submit, on the question of the rule of Ireland in the future, that the verdict of Ireland herself is the most potent. The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) stated, in 1866 or 1867, that he held, with regard to the Government of Ireland, the principle which every Liberal held with regard to that and every other country, that such a form of Government as the majority of the Irish people demanded the majority should receive. Hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House informed the constituencies of England that the representation of Ireland in that Parliament had been filched by the National Party from the Irish people by intimidation, "Boycotting," and means of that nature; and even yet, notwithstanding the repudiation of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh is still prepared to assert that proposition. The way to test the truth of such an utterance was to go to the constituencies at the polls. Why did not the Party who made such accusations send their men to the polls, the only test of the accuracy of what they had insinuated and declared? Hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House had the more pleasing duty of instructing the English electors and the Scotch electors. However, Sir, the fact is that the verdict of Ireland has been given for the second time, and by four-fifths of the Representatives of the Irish people. By that verdict every Irishman and every Liberal ought to be prepared to stand. These are a few of the reasons why I cannot consider correct the statement that the issue of the Elections is final or irrevocable. The noble Lord who leads the Government had declared his policy with regard to the Land Question at considerable length; and I am glad to say that, without infringing the Rules of the House, I think that I can illustrate the declarations of the noble Lord on the subject by other declarations which should be considered in connection with them. First, Sir, regarding the judicial rents, for example. There is a strange contradiction in much of the policy of the Government. The judicial rents are so sacred that they shall be maintained against all comers. The police shall be sent in strength; the soldiers shall be supplied in any amount to maintain them—aye, even if there is not a vestige of crime in Ireland; but the tenant merely makes a refusal to pay rent. In that event the noble Lord has said that the House should be called together, and the Government would ask it to give them the power to put into gaol every man unable or unwilling to pay the last farthing he has in the world. But, Sir, scarcely had the noble Lord finished his declaration with regard to the immutability of the sacredness of the judicial rents, when he went on to declare that a Commission of Inquiry and Examination, with the object of finding out whether those judicial rents were or were not sacred, was to be established. The words are—

"The Commissioners will be appointed to inquire to what extent, if any, and in what parts of Ireland the operation of the Land Act of 1881 is without effect, either by combination to resist the enforcement of legal obligations, or by exceptional circumstances."

And so on. The pleasing duty of this Commission is to inquire if the judicial rents are rack rents or impossible rents. The policy is illogical, Sir, and unwise. It is illogical, because it declares, in one breath, that judicial rents are fixed and immutable, and, in the next, that they are matters of legitimate reformatory inquiry. It is unwise, Sir, because the Commission suggested will not meet before the end of next spring. Next spring, Sir, it is intended to report if the judicial rents are rents that can be paid by the tenantry of Ireland. Sir, everybody knows that by that time the question will have been settled. The crisis in Ireland, Sir, comes next November. The fall in the value of agricultural produce which is to be inquired into at the end of next spring exists, Sir, at the present moment. Already, Sir, the decline in the value of produce has proved that the judicial rents are impossible of payment; and, Sir, what satisfaction to the Irish tenant, thrown out to perish by the roadside in November, because he was unable to pay an impossible rent, is it to be informed that, had he held out a little longer, he would not have been asked to pay that impossible rent? Before the policy is able to be carried out at the end of next spring, Sir, there will be many a man and woman and child far beyond the reach of any relief that legislation can give. When the shivering farmer, Sir, is lying by the roadside, when his home is broken up, and his wife and children in the graveyard close by, what satisfaction will it be to him to be told that the rent, which cost him his home and laid low his wife and his children, was a rent which the Commission of Inquiry declared to be beyond his power of paying? This means, Sir, that the judicial rents are acknowledged by implication to be too high, for they are the subject of inquiry for a Commission; and the failure to pay that rent, whether it be high or low, whether it be just or unjust, will cause the tenant to be driven out on the roadside. The noble Lord was courageous enough to quote the late Prime Minister in proof of the statement that the judicial rents under the Land Act of 1881 were final. Sir, the late Prime Minister never committed himself to the statement that the Land Act was the last word to be said on the Irish Land Question. What he stated was that he declined at that time further to disturb social order in Ireland so completely as the Irish Members seemed to demand. The noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale is quoted by the noble Lord the Leader of the House of Commons as saying that the Land Act of 1881, as regards the dual ownership, was only a modus vivendi; but the noble Marquess himself was a very important Member of the Ministry which passed the Land Act of 1881. How, then, can he be quoted as saying that the Land Settlement was only a modus vivendi, and, at the same time, as an authority for saying that it was the final and last settlement of the Liberal Party? We must take the noble Marquess as a responsible Member of the Government of the late Prime Minister in 1881, and his words must be taken as showing and proving that the Land Act was not final. Accordingly, if the noble Marquess is a testimony, we have a right to call upon him in favour of our statement that neither the judicial rents, nor anything else in the Act of 1881, were regarded as final by the Government of that day. Take the nature of the clauses with regard to the judicial rent. The main provision shows that it was not meant to be final. Everybody knows that the judicial rent was fixed for a term of 15 years. Does not that mean that the rental was not regarded as an immutable thing which, under no change of circumstances, or times, or character, could be altered? When the late Prime Minister fixed the term of the judicial rent at 15 years, he meant to declare that the judicial rent should be subject to revision. If we are able to show that a revolutionary change of circumstances has occurred in Ireland since the Land Act was passed, we have a right to ask this House, fairly and frankly, to consider the question whether the period of revision was not fixed at too long a date, and whether circumstances have not occurred since which justify us in demanding that that term shall be largely curtailed. The judicial rents, however, should not, according to the noble Lord—and he was careful in saying it—be lowered. Whatever occurs, the landlord is to be saved. It may be at the cost of hundreds of thousands of Irish homes, at the cost of thousands of Irish lives, of millions of Irish money; but the landlords of Ireland must be saved. That is a portion of the policy of the Government I have a right to commend to the serious attention of the Liberal Leaders. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Maclean) speaks of the verdict against Home Rule being final and irrevocable; but there were two verdicts given—there were two things on which the constituencies pronounced. They pronounced upon the question of Home Rule, but they also pronounced upon the question of Land Purchase; and of the two verdicts that upon the question of Land Purchase was, by a great deal, the more emphatic. Do I not state the notorious facts of the case when I say that many hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal Benches were forced by their constituents to declare that they would never risk a penny of English money for the sake of the Irish landlords? If the verdict against Home Rule was irrevocable and so final, what shall we say to the verdict on the question of Land Purchase? I am not saying this in a spirit of controversy. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh; but I am not dealing at present with any point that concerns them. It is a little family quarrel we have to settle on this side. Do we not recollect the fact that the main argument of a considerable number of Liberal Unionists against the late Prime Minister was his Land Purchase proposal; and who forgets the eloquent, impassioned, and potent language in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) called upon all classes and sections of the population in England and Scotland, and Ireland and Wales, to rise against the Home Rule proposals of the Prime Minister because of his land proposals? The Irish farmer was implored not to pay too much money for his land under the scheme of the late Prime Minister. The Scotch crofter was asked to contrast the generosity of the late Prime Minister to the Irish landlord with his niggardliness towards the Scotch crofter. The artisan, heavily burdened as he was with taxation, was asked not to put himself under fresh burdens by adopting the proposals of the late Prime Minister attached to Home Rule; and the labourers were implored not to support the late Prime Minister's Home Rule proposals unless they were prepared to sacrifice the three acres and the cow. I want to know, then, what is to be the attitude of these Liberal Unionists towards the Land Purchase proposals of the present Government? That Land Purchase policy of the Government, shadowed forth in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, combines, I think, every possible objection that can be raised from the point of view either of the Irish farmer or of the English taxpayer. The one person only who would have a right to be contented with the Land Purchase policy of the Government is the Irish landlord. I must congratulate the noble Lord on the candour with which he declared his policy with regard to Land Purchase. He said—

"A serious mistake will be made by any who think that Government contemplate any further dealings with the Land Question in Ireland in the direction of any revision of rent."

- No; nothing is to be taken from the rent, whatever happens. If the Commission reports against the rent as too high, still the tenant shall be forced to pay so much money as will leave the landlord in the possession of the same amount of money interest in the land. I may illustrate this by quoting some words which were uttered "elsewhere" about the same thing. These words were—

"If it should come out that the Courts have made blunders, and that there is an impossibility in any case of paying rent, I think it is not the landlords who should bear the loss."

The inference is that if the tenant is not able to pay, the State and not the landlord should bear the loss. The Rules of this House will not permit me to say who is the author of that statement; but I think that the House will readily guess who was the enlightened commentator who put the footnotes to the speech of the noble Lord, so that we might clearly understand the meaning. However high the rack-rent, the tenant is to pay it, or as much of it as he can, because the noble Lord does recognize that it may be impossible for him to pay the whole amount; and he goes on to say that, in that case, there will be an obligation of purchase by the State—that it shall be the State and not the landlords who must suffer. Even if it should be proved that prices have been so lowered that the tenant can no longer pay his rent the landlord is not to suffer. That is a startling doctrine with regard to landlordism. Now, we on these Benches have always preached the doctrine of honesty in Land Purchase. We have always declared that it was our duty not to allow the Irish farmers to be burdened with such terms as would give them no choice but between bankruptcy and repudiation. We were willing, under the proposals of the late Prime Minister, to put our national existence, our national liberties, our National Assembly, as the hostages for the full payment of the landlord's rent, and that duty has been made even more sacred by the events of the last Election. I am sure the late Prime Minister must feel rewarded, even amidst the failure of his projects, by the enormous change which has been produced in the feelings of the people of England and Ireland towards each other. There is not a man on these Benches among my Colleagues who does not feel profound gratitude to the working classes of England, Scotland, and Wales for the verdict they gave upon the Irish Question. Chicago is not the place where you go for any very gushing expressions of friendship towards this country—there are too many of the former friends of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Home Secretary there for that. Yet there the warmest expressions were used towards the working men of England. On this point, may I not remind the House of the words he has issued in praise of "true-hearted Irishmen" who have belonged to revolutionary societies in former times, men like Wolfe Tone and Robert Emmet? I quite agree with every single word of these utterances. ["Hear, hear!"] I accept the cheer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as indicating that he adheres to what he said as to these men; and I am sorry he has found it necessary to allude, in terms of vituperation, to men of the present day who are seeking to obtain by Constitutional means practically the same ends as those gentlemen fought for by arms. Yet, Sir, I am sure that everybody on these Benches, and I am sure every rational man in England, will receive with gratification the information that, at the Irish-American Convention at Chicago, thanks were passed to Mr. Gladstone. The Irish Members on this question of Land Purchase have, then, a double obligation to the Irish farmer, and they have an obligation to the English artisan; and the obligation in both cases imposes the same duty—namely, not to accept any system of Land Purchase which, by giving an inflated price to the property of the landlords, places upon the Irish tenant a burden which he cannot meet, and which may have to be met by the British artisan. If the landlord is to get more than he is entitled to for the land, the security of the British taxpayer is so far damaged. Unless the Irish farmer makes a good bargain, the security of the British taxpayer is to that extent damaged; and, therefore, to any such Land Purchase proposal as is put forward by the Government, every section of the Opposition—Liberals, Radicals, and Nationalists, Liberal Unionists, above all others—are bound to give energetic, uncompromising, and constant antagonism. Well, Sir, that is not the only proposal of the Government with regard to the future of Ireland. They are going to maintain the judicial rents, and inquire into the question whether the tenants are able to pay the rents. The question, Sir, has passed out of the region of controversy. Any man with any practical acquaintance with the agricultural circumstances of Ireland, or of England, Scotland, and Wales, for that matter, for the three countries are very much alike, has come to the conclusion that we have approached a great crisis. Take up the papers every day, and what do we find? I read that a gentleman named Mr. Walter Morrison—I do not know if that is the hon. Gentleman of the same name who sits in this House for one of the Divisions of Yorkshire—returned no less than 50 per cent of his rents in 1884, and 60 per cent of his present year's rents. Even the noble Lord has been forced to acknowledge that the fall in prices had produced a grave crisis in England and Scotland; and I dare say we shall have the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) proposing some measure for assisting the farmers of this country in the crisis which has been brought about by the fall in prices. I do not know whether he will have any better success in his position as an independent Member than when he sat on that (the Treasury) Bench; but, undoubtedly, it is admitted on all hands that the farmers of England cannot carry on their business without some remissions. In one paper I read that Mr. W. H. Smith—I presume that is the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War—had given a reduction of 40 per cent on his rents. I hope the right hon. Gentleman does not think that I am blaming him; but I argue that it is certain that a state of things which renders such reductions of 40 per cent necessary in England, a fortiori, renders a reduction of 40 per cent necessary in Ireland. You have better land in England. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] No! that is an astonishing proposition. I suppose hon. Members of the Tory Party will also deny my next proposition—that you have a larger population. I remember that the Gentleman who said "No" distinguished himself in the last Parliament rather by his "Noes" than by his speeches. In England you have large markets—in Ireland we have none at all, except in two or three large towns, and we have to rely almost entirely upon exportation. In England you have the most perfect railroad system in the whole world—in Ireland we have a railroad system the deficiencies of which are the apology for some of the legislation which has passed this House. Does anyone say that reductions of rent which are necessary in a country of great fertility, of large markets, with a splendid railway system and great wealth, are to be denied in a country of small population, few markets, and imperfect and undeveloped railroads? I think I have proved that part of my statement, and I have only to go to the ranks of our opponents to find confirmation of my proposition. Sir James Caird, who is described by The Times as "a man whose authority on agricultural questions is universally recognized," declared that on 538,000 holdings Ireland the rent was perfectly irrecoverable, and The Times endorsed that statement in a leading article; but that was when the late Prime Minister was in power. It is the most extraordinary thing about the Irish farmer that he has as many changes of face and character as if he were the noble Lord, or the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. When the Liberal Leader was dealing with the question of his rents, he was in a state of squalor and bankruptcy; but when the Tory Party comes to deal with the question, he is in a state of bloated and almost insolent prosperity. Well, Sir, we have besides the Land Purchase Scheme, in which the landlord is paid out of the pockets of the Irish farmer and the British taxpayer, a large system of public works. Everything is to be taken in hand—railways, tramways, even the fishes in the sea, will not escape the vigilant inquiries of the Government, and the benevolence of the State. What does all this mean? We were told in the late controversy that the Prime Minister—I mean the late Prime Minister; the right hon. Gentleman is so often Prime Minister that it is rather hard to avoid using the term—it is the normal condition of affairs which will soon recur in the late controversy, the late Prime Minister was denounced for charging on the taxpayers a burden of £50,000,000. We were told that the outlay would become a vast grant, reaching to £150,000,000—some of the Tory and Unionist Press actually said to £250,000,000, resting its burden on the shoulders of the British taxpayers. ["Hear, hear:"] I should like to know who said "Hear, hear," because I should like to cross-examine him. Well, this burden of £250,000,000, be it remarked, was to come from dealing unfairly and hardly with the landlords; but the Tory Party are now going to deal with the landlords, and deal with them in a far more generous fashion than ever the late Liberal Minister did; and if the land proposals of the late Prime Minister would have involved this country in a burden of £250,000,000 on his parsimonious and mean terms, surely the generous and large-hearted proposals of the present Government in the Land Purchase way will involve the country in a burden of £300,000,000. But they are going to spend money on railways, and trams, and fishes; and I think the most moderate amount which will be required for these various purposes may be put at £100,000,000—I might as well say a total of £500,000,000. I have sufficient confidence in the good sense of this House to know that they will at once repudiate and protest against any such policy as that. Well, Sir, I object to money being given to Ireland in the shape of disguised alms. We want to make Ireland a country of self-respecting and respected men—we do not want to make it a country of men bribed, demoralized, and cheated; and I lay this down—that money given to Ireland on any guarantee, except the guarantee of a central Assembly, responsible to Ireland and to this country, will be money that will be jobbed and wasted away. I know it is a popular thing to propose blank cheques on the Exchequer. I daresay in Ireland there may be some who would regard it as a good thing to have a blank cheque on the English Exchequer and the amount never to be repaid; but they are a very small class. Money spent on public works, on Bodies that are not representative, is bound to be wasted in jobbery; and money given to Ireland under circumstances like this is a curse to the people who give it, and a greater curse to the people who receive it. The policy of the Government is a policy which, I think, requires prompt discussion and prompt repudiation. After all, the Liberal Party is in the majority in this House, and to whatever section its Members belong they are all alike the guardians of the Treasury of this country. Further, we have in this Land Purchase scheme a coercive attempt to inflate the rents. If the tenant has no chance but to be turned out of his holding—especially if he be a husband or a father—the temptation is enormous that he should give an extravagant price for his holding, in order to purchase present peace even at the cost of future trouble. That is the policy of the Government—they make these proposals to the Irish tenants at a time when they are gagged and chained. The policy of the Government makes a declaration of war against the twice-repeated verdict of the Irish people. It is a policy that has issued a decree of starvation against hundreds of thousands of Irish tenants who are unable to pay their rents. It is a policy which, in the interests of the Irish landlords, is willing to sacrifice Irish homes, Irish lives, the peace and good feeling between England and Ireland. It is a policy which, for the sake of the Irish landlords, is willing to exhaust all the resources of the Exchequer, to more heavily burden still the burdened taxpayers of this country. A gigantic land scheme under this policy will be carried out, under every circumstance that will give inflated prices followed by bankruptcy in Ireland, while England is burdened with irrevocable debt. It is a policy of Land Purchase combined with a scheme of public works which is bound to lead to jobbery and demoralization. The Irish people are to be bribed into a surrender of their national demand by a blank cheque on the British Parliament; but I have much mistaken the temper of this House if to the unholy trinity of coercion, bankruptcy, and repudiation they will not give a final and irrevocable answer.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): According to the usual arrangements of this House, it unfortunately happens that the Leader of the Opposition addresses the House before the statement made by the chief Member of the Government. The result on this occasion has been that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was compelled to address the House before the important speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the Irish policy of the Government. That is greatly to be regretted, because the statement of the views held with reference to that speech by Gentlemen who sit upon this side of the House would undoubtedly have come from my right hon. Friend with exceptional weight. It is necessary, however, that we should make some remarks upon the very important declarations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Certainly, nobody can complain that this statement was wanting in definiteness and precision. In stating the views of the Government upon the subject of Ireland he laid down certain fundamental propositions. He first of all challenged the policy of the late Government in connecting the three questions of social order, of land, and of local government, and then declared that the present Government would adopt a totally different principle; that they did not regard those three questions as connected; and that they would be dealt with separately, in great part at any rate. But upon the most important question of all, the question of social order, the noble Lord was extremely distinct; for at the very commencement of his speech he made this most important statement, which I consider to be the keystone of the whole policy of the Government. He said—"Social order we mean to treat as a question absolutely by itself." Now, Sir, that statement, the House cannot understand too well, takes direct issue with the views and policy of the late Administration. We have always regarded—we do now regard—the question on principle—and I venture to say that it is a fundamental principle, and always has been and I trust always will be a fundamental principle, of the Liberal Party—that social order cannot be treated with success as a question absolutely by itself. Every action of the Liberal Party from generation to generation has been founded upon the principle that social order is a question that cannot be treated by itself; that social order depends upon the removal of the grounds out of which social order arises. That is the principle of the Liberal Party, and the noble Lord has justly challenged it. Lord Salisbury, in a speech some months ago, said that the principles upon which the Tory Party would govern Ireland were the traditional principles of the Tory Party. The noble Lord has enumerated and proclaimed the traditional principles of the Tory Party, when he said that they would deal with social order, and treat it as a question absolutely by itself. That was the principle upon which the Tory Party acted at the conclusion of the last and the commencement of the present centuries—that was the principle of Lord Eldon and Lord Castlereagh; it was the principle of Lord Sidmouth; it was the principle upon which all their acts were founded—it is the fundamental principle of the Tory Party, and to that principle we have been, and we always shall be, radically opposed. The Government are going to invoke distinguished warriors to aid them in carrying out that principle. But that principle was invoked and attempted by a warrior who was more distinguished than any whose services the Government can now demand. That was the principle which in the early part of the century the Duke of Wellington attempted to carry out. Now, Sir, social order, in our opinion, cannot be treated as a question by itself. Social order can never be treated except in concert with the redress of those grievances out of which the social disorder has arisen; for social disorder is not the evil itself—it is but the symptom of the evil. If you are to seek to remedy it, you must first of all understand the nature of the evil with which you have to deal; and I venture to say that we who profess the principles of the Liberal Party are bound to say that no Government, whether in Ireland or in any other country, can succeed upon a principle which starts with treating social disorder as a question to be treated absolutely by itself. In those days, when social disorder was treated by itself, as the noble Lord proposes to do, we were told by a great authority—and we accepted the principle at the time, and we accept it still, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman adheres to it himself—that “force is no remedy.” What does that mean, except a condemnation of the principle that social order is to be treated as a question by itself? Well, Sir, it is against that principle that we have protested, not in England alone, not in Ireland alone, but all over the world. What was it that was preached to foreign countries in the despatches of Lord Palmerston? Nations that were suffering from social disorder, nations that were endeavouring to treat social disorder absolutely by itself, were told by us that that was a false principle in political ethics. We told them that no Government could succeed which treated social disorder as a question by itself, which endeavoured simply to put it down. I am old enough to remember the days when there was social disorder in England, when men were shot in the streets of towns in Lancashire. In the midst of all the distress there occurred the bread riots of Preston in 1843 or 1844 under the Government of Sir Robert Peel. Was social disorder in that instance treated by itself by Sir Robert Peel? Was that condition of almost unbroken tranquillity which England has now enjoyed for 40 years brought about in that way? No, Sir; social disorder then was cured by the repeal of the Corn Laws. That is an example of how impossible it is to adopt the principle of treating social disorder as a question by itself. No doubt you can put down social disorder by means of a distinguished General and bayonets. Cavour once said—“You may do anything with bayonets except sit upon them;” but, whatever effect you may produce by treating social disorder by itself, you never will produce a condition of permanent repose. That, I contend, has always been the principle on which the Liberal Party have acted. Was the social disorder of 1829 dealt with by treating it by itself? No, Sir; it was accompanied by the Act of Emancipation. Then, again, there was social disorder in 1832 and 1833; but that was followed by the settlement of the tithe question. There was social disorder in 1866 and 1867, and that was dealt with by the Irish Church Act. Therefore, I say, in contradiction of the principle enunciated by the Government, you cannot deal with social disorder by itself. You must endeavour to deal with the causes from which that social disorder arises. But how are you to treat this question of social disorder? The principle for which we have always contended, and shall always contend, is that you never can have social order in any country except where the people who are governed are in sympathy and in harmony with the Government under which they live. That is the fundamental principle of the Liberal Party. That is the principle which we have applied to England, and which we have endeavoured to apply to Ireland. Unless you can reach that end, unless you can find a method of bringing the subject into sympathy and harmony with the Government under which they live, you cannot reach social order by any method,

Sir William Harcourt

I care not what it is, you choose to adopt. You may say you have tried all these things in Ireland. You have tried emancipation; you have tried the settlement of the tithe; you have tried the Land Act, and still you have social disorder. But what is the conclusion you should arrive at from that state of circumstances? Is it that the principle upon which you have proceeded is wrong, or that you have mistaken the symptoms and have not yet touched the real cause of the evil—that there is something else which prevents the harmony between the subjects and the Government under which they live? But, you will say, what is the cause? Everyone must admit that one of the main causes of social disorder and discontent in Ireland is the want of the satisfaction of the national sentiment; and, in my opinion, until you have removed that source of social disorder you will never reach the true remedy for the evil you desire to cure. I have said that the principle of the Liberal Party is that you can never cure social disorder until you bring the people into harmony with the Government under which they live; but I should be doing injustice to the Tory Party opposite if I were to say that none among them share that sentiment. Allow me to read a sentence to the House. In doing so I shall observe the same caution as the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who has just sat down, and I will not tell the House the source from which this quotation proceeds; but hon. Members will be able, I think, to make a pretty shrewd guess at it. The sentence runs as follows:—

“There are many Viceroys who have been brought face to face with this grinding pauperism in Ireland. Why have they all failed? Many reasons may be given, but perhaps this reason will be found deep down in the question—there has been a serious want of accord between the English and Irish nations. The Irish heart is not attuned in concert, and until that sympathy is in some degree restored there cannot be a satisfactory settlement of the Irish Question.”

I will break my promise, and will say that those are the sentiments of the last Tory Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. You think you are going to settle the question of social order by itself. Has that experiment never been tried? Have you not tried from generation to generation to settle social order by itself? Are you so vain as to think you are so superior in the art of governing to all who have preceded you that you will succeed where they have failed disastrously? You give no credit to Liberal Governments. You say they have never honestly tried to enforce the law. You will hardly say that of the administration of Lord Spencer. But I will make you a present of Liberal Governments, and I will assume that they were either incompetent or unwilling to maintain social order in Ireland. I will ask you what has been the experience of Tory Administrations in Ireland? You will not condemn them; you will not say that they were unwilling or that they were incapable of maintaining social order in Ireland. What was the experience of the Tory Governments of the Earl of Derby and of Mr. Disraeli in 1867? They were responsible for the government of Ireland. It was at that time the Fenian outbreak and the Clerkenwell explosion occurred. Why did not they settle social order by itself in 1866 and 1867? I will take another Government of much longer life—that of Lord Beaconsfield from 1874 to 1880. There were able administrators in the Government of Ireland; it included the present Chief Secretary and the Dukes of Abercorn and Marlborough as Lords Lieutenant. Were they incompetent men, who did not understand the arts of government? And were they able to establish social order by itself? What was the result of six years of their administration? Read the letter addressed by Lord Beaconsfield to the Duke of Marlborough, in which he said, if I remember rightly, that the condition of Ireland, after six years of Tory Government, was a condition worse than that of pestilence or of famine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): No, no!

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, I have not the words with me; but I think I have quoted them correctly.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The words to which the right hon. Gentleman refers were that if measures for which the right hon. Gentleman has since been responsible were introduced into Ireland the condition of things would be worse than pestilence and famine.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am very sorry I have not the words here;

but I venture to say that before to-morrow the House will have the opportunity of verifying the words of the letter in which Lord Beaconsfield described a condition of veiled rebellion in Ireland as a condition in respect of social disorder which was disastrous. Well, that was the condition of Ireland at the conclusion of six years of Tory administration in 1880. But we have had a more recent Tory Administration. There was one from June or July of 1885 to February, 1886. They had six months to establish social order by itself in Ireland. I suppose they will not say they deliberately relaxed the law; they will not assert they did not use all the arts of government to maintain social order in Ireland. And what was the result of that six months' experience? They came down and said they had totally failed, and they proposed a policy of repressive measures. Therefore I do not ask to be judged by our standard; but, judging you by your own standard—that of Tory administration—I say that the policy of attempting to establish social order by itself has been tried by you and it has failed. What has been our policy in this respect with respect to other portions of the Dominions of the Queen? You had a rebellion in Canada; and did you attempt to establish social order by itself in Canada? On the contrary, you met the national sentiment of Canada, and you established social order in Canada by giving Canada what she wanted. There were many predictions of evil consequences on that occasion. I wish I had here the speech made by the late Lord Derby upon the terrible dangers that would arise in Canada in consequence of the concession of local self-government. It was said that it would lead to absolute separation between the two countries, and to the declaration of a Republic in Canada. That only shows how vain are apprehensions of that character. Well, you think you will treat social order by itself apart from everything else. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER here offered the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the book containing the letter referred to.] The noble Lord will have the advantage presently of reading it; but I will take the critical question of "Boycotting," which is, in my opinion, one of the greatest offences against social order that can be committed. What did Lord Salisbury say on that subject in his Newport speech? And I believe more recently he spoke to the same effect. He said you cannot put it down by the ordinary law; and he much doubted whether you could put it down by any exceptional law. How, then, are you going to put it down by itself? How are you going to restore social order with respect to "Boycotting"—by the operation of any number of general or any number of exceptional laws? You can only put it down by removing the causes out of which it arises. The question of social order cannot be dealt with solely by itself. Therefore, your fundamental principle is one against which we on this side of the House feel bound absolutely to protest. The principle for which we contend is exactly the opposite. We say that social order cannot be restored by dealing with it by itself; it can only be restored by removing the causes which have led to the disorder. That is the principle of the Liberal Party for which, whether in a majority or a minority, we are bound to contend. The noble Lord went on to the question of the land, and on that he took the line of the absolute finality of the settlement of 1881. He said that nothing should induce him to depart from that finality, to which he maintained my right hon. Friend had pledged the country and the House. But it is from those Benches the first attack on the finality of the Land Act comes. There was a Notice given the other night by the great Irish henchman of the noble Lord—the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson); and that Notice overturns the whole fabric of the Land Act, for it is a Motion to include leaseholders within its operation; and yet, after this Notice is given behind his back, the noble Lord attempts to insist on the finality of the Land Act of 1881. But he says the Land Question is to be treated apart, by itself, and distinct from every other question. That is not consistent with another part of his statement; because he says the Land Purchase Bill of 1885 may be altered and improved upon one condition, and that is that the additional security is given by the Local Authorities. Well, that connects the Land Question with the question of local self-government; because where are the Local Authorities to come from except from the plan of local self-government to which he is opposed? Therefore, at every point you find the principle enunciated by the Government of treating these questions separately is one which is not only entirely unstatesmanlike, but practically impossible. You cannot separate one of these questions from any other; they are absolutely one and indivisible. But the noble Lord says he will deal with the Land Question apart. Well, there is against him a high authority who says—

"There can be no doubt that in certain parts of Ireland the Land Question is at the root of the condition of social order. There are certain parts of Ireland in which the poverty is so great and the condition of the people is such that until the poverty is removed all hope of restoring prosperity is simply delusive."

That is the testimony of the last Tory Lord Lieutenant.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: He is not a Member of the present Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am told he is not a Member of the present Government. Well, Governments in these days succeed each other rapidly; and I know the noble Lord is quite at liberty to repudiate Lord Carnarvon if he likes. I am quite content to quote this as an authoritative opinion, for Lord Carnarvon was responsible for several months for the government of Ireland, and he knows its condition. If what Lord Carnarvon says is true, the Land Question cannot be dealt with separately. He says it is at the root of the whole Irish Question and the question of social order. Much has been said about agricultural distress, a question on which I do not profess to be an authority. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool has quoted the well-known letter of Sir James Caird, which has not been without its effect upon the Irish people. It has been denied that the land in Ireland is poorer than the land in England. No doubt, there is some rich land in Ireland; but the greater part of the land is certainly poorer than that of England. Sir James Caird distinguishes between 538,000 holders of land under £6 rental, and 121,000 holders at a higher rental; and speaking of the 538,000, he said, from his knowledge and observation, that economical rent had ceased in Ireland. Sir James Caird said that it was absolutely true that from 538,000 holders in Ireland any economical rent had for the present disappeared. Now, the commentary of The Times upon that was to show how unprofitable was the proposal of the late Government to buy land which would yield no rent. The object of The Times was to show that rent from such tenants was irrecoverable by anybody—the landlords, the English Government, or the Irish Government. Now, do you suppose that a paper like The Times, the representative of the propertied classes of this country, would make a statement of that kind—a statement which would be known in every village and house in Ireland—without being certain of its data? A fact like that is not to be got rid of, be aiso the newspaper now says there was no difficulty about paying rent, and that to suggest that there was a difficulty was absurd. I say it is impossible that any statement like that can go forth in The Times without having the greatest effect on the conditions of any country. Now, the noble Lord says that the great distress had arisen from the depression of prices. ["No, no!"] Well, I am sure many hon. Members behind him will not say "No, no!"

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I object to being misquoted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) below the Gangway will not contradict me. Well, the noble Lord says the fall has only been in corn, and does not affect Ireland. The noble Lord has his explanation ready. It is that the Irish farmers make their butter so badly. How is it that the Irish farmers have developed this failure to make butter within the last few years? Is there any Gentleman who knows anything of dairy produce who does not know that there has been a great fall in prices? The noble Lord has just handed to me this extract from the letter to the Duke of Marlborough. The extract is—

"Nevertheless, a danger, in its ultimate results scarcely less disastrous than pestilence and famine, and which now engages your Excellency's attention, distracts that country."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman read the last paragraph, describing the danger? I am sure he would not wish to mislead the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: This is the end. ["No!"] I know the noble Lord has a hereditary interest in the passage. The letter is rather long.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: There is the passage I wish you to read.

MR. SEXTON: Read it all.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Lord Beaconsfield says—

"Nevertheless, a danger, in its ultimate results scarcely less disastrous than pestilence and famine, and which now engages your Excellency's attention, distracts that country."

Well, that describes the condition of Ireland at the close of six years of Tory administration. Then he says that—

"A portion of its population is attempting to sever the Constitutional tie which unites it to Great Britain in that bond which has favoured the power and prosperity of both."

But that was all under the auspices of a Tory Government. Why did not the Tory Government put an end to all this? It was under the auspices of that Government that the Land League was inaugurated. It grew from infancy to manhood under the Tory Administration, and the last act of that Tory Administration was to institute a prosecution of the Land League, which it did not go on with. It is, therefore, clear that a Tory Government of six years is not an absolute panacea for social disorder. I do not wish to carry it further. Let me go back to the condition of land tenure in Ireland. Not only is it seriously affected in that country by low prices, but here in England the agricultural interest has suffered also. Indeed there is scarcely a country in the world that has not suffered from agricultural depression. Such has been the case in America and in almost every country in Europe. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool has referred with approbation to the conduct of the English landlords in view of the present depression—that is to say, they made a reduction of rents in consequence of the depression. Well, I am inclined to refer with approbation to the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), who was sent by the last Tory Government to Ireland on a special mission to propose to the Irish landlords moderation in the exaction of rent, and, no matter what the result of that special mission was, a better Commissioner could not have been sent, for he was willing to preach to the Irish landlords not only by precept but by example. Well, what was the course taken by Lord Carnarvon last year when he was not repudiated by the noble Lord? Why, Lord Carnarvon, addressing the Irish landlords I think somewhere in the North of Ireland, implored them to exercise moderation in the interests of good government; not to press on evictions which would make the task of good government well nigh impossible. What has been the language of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) on this question? At a time when the English landlords are, from a sense of justice or humanity or policy, exercising the most extreme moderation in the exaction of rents, although their legal rights are unimpaired, the noble Lord, addressing the landlords of Ireland, says that the policy of the Government will be to see that all the legal obligations and processes arising out of the Irish Land Act are strictly enforced and carried out so far as they come within the province of the Government; and that if there are any persons in this House of opinion that there will be by the Government any interference with or suspension by neglect, or by executive action of the right of the landlords to recover their lands in the event of non-payment of rent, they fall into a great and serious error. I do not complain of the assertion of the sacredness of legal obligations; but I do think it matter for regret when language of this sort is employed as an incitement and an indication to the landlords of Ireland to exact the utmost farthing—language which can only be understood, both by them and by their tenants, as an assurance that whatever may be the agricultural distress or the incapacity of particular tenants to pay their rents, if they will only evict the tenants they shall have the whole armed force of the British nation at their backs. Indeed, no language on the part of a responsible Government could at this moment be more dangerous to the cause of social order. Well, but all this time, as the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool has just said, you betray your own distrust of your own position by appointing a Commission to inquire into the question whether or not those men whom you say shall pay the whole rent can pay the whole rent; and then you make the extraordinary proposition that if they can not pay the whole rent—it is not the difference in the rent, as I understand, that Lord Salisbury proposes to pay; what he does propose to pay is to buy up at a capital sum, at the expense of the British taxpayer, land upon a rental which it is impossible the land could ever obtain—the very proposition denounced by the The Times in connection with the letter of Sir James Caird. Now, I am bound to say my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham who sits near me (Mr. Chamberlain)—[“Oh, oh!”]—well, we have differed upon many subjects, but I take great care in mentioning one on which we agree—had considered this question and he had a remedy for it. Everyone will remember his proposal contained in a speech by him on the second reading of the Government of Ireland Bill. One remarkable part of the settlement which he suggested was that a settlement pertaining of the character of purchase should be preceded by a stay of evictions. Now, what does that mean? It meant the conviction on the part of my right hon. Friend that it was not safe to use the language which the noble Lord has used to encourage an increase of evictions on the part of Irish landlords, and that whatever settlement you come to must be in the interest of social order—I remember he called it the “Truce of God,” which must be continued until a new settlement was arrived at by a proposal to stay evictions. I venture to say that whatever faults that scheme might have—and it had faults—it had not the grievous fault which the scheme of the Government has of precipitating the policy of eviction and of recommending its increase. I have said that the Government are going to refer this question to a Commission. It is a very extraordinary proceeding. So far as social order is concerned they do not want any Commission at all. That they settle by itself; and it is to be settled, as we understand, by a distinguished General. But with regard to the other questions they have Commissions. I should say that the plan of the Government, as I understand it, is, as regards social order, a Government by Generals, and as regards all the rest it is a Government by Commissions. This resort to Commissions by the Government reminds me of an artist once described in a speech of Canning’s, in which he spoke of an artist who had devoted his attention specially to the development of a particular class of painting. He was an admirable artist in red lions. He was applied to by the owner of a public-house for his opinion with regard to a signboard, and he at once recommended a red lion, and the red lion was painted accordingly. His next client consulted him with regard to the painting of a country house, in the drawing-room of which a large compartment had been left to be filled in subsequently. “I want,” says the owner, “some painting to suit this place.” The artist at once said—“Do not you think a very handsome red lion would suit?” And then Canning described how the gentleman consented with some reluctance to the red lion. The gentleman then took the artist to his library and showed him a small compartment, and said that he wanted something of a choice character there. The artist said—“Do not you think we might put a small red lion here?” The Commissions to be appointed by Her Majesty’s Government partook of a character similar to the red lions of the artist described by Canning. If it is the Land Question they have a handsome Commission; if it is the question of developing the industrial resources of Ireland it is a small Commission; but, whatever it is, it is always a Commission. It is practically the only picture of statesmanship which Her Majesty’s Government appear to command. But the noble Lord says—“Oh, of course, we have Commissions because we have no intuition.” But they were not always so wanting in intuition as they are now. In requiring until the spring to inquire—why, we remember that only one Gentleman constituted himself a Commission last year—the present Secretary of State for War—he did the whole of the Government Commission business at that time. He was sent over to Ireland; he did not wait to the end of the spring—no, 24 hours was enough for him; he did not show that want of intuition of which the noble Lord complained on the part of the Government. But really there is some advantage in these short intervals of administration. I wish to remind the noble Lord that this time last year they had had every opportunity for seven months to make themselves acquainted with all those subjects connected with the Irish

Government of which now they say they are wholly ignorant. They had the assistance of the whole machinery of the Irish Government. They had the Lord Lieutenant, they had the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, as well as other sources of information; and now, after the lapse of six months, they come forward and say—"We have no intuition; we know nothing about Ireland; do not hurry us." In the meanwhile, however, there are questions which will be hurried. Though it may be unfortunate that we have a Government without intuition, and though we have a Government which, in spite of being in the occupation of power and with the means of knowledge at their disposal for many months last year, and who now know nothing about these Irish questions, there are at the same time questions which give no repose to Governments. They had knowledge enough at that time without going to inquire of one of the questions to be referred to a Commission—whether rent has been at all affected by combinations in Ireland which operate on rent. They made up their minds on that subject last year; they determined in January to suppress the National League. It would seem that at that time they wanted not that information for which they are now waiting; but when this Commission is appointed I would ask, with the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), what it is to do? It is to inquire whether the land can pay the rent; but it is to be absolutely excluded from making any alteration in the rent after making the inquiry. Of course, the Commission would not make the alteration; but the noble Lord has said that rent is out of the question altogether. What, then, is this Commission to do? If it reports in accordance with Sir James Caird and The Times that 538,000 tenants in Ireland cannot pay rent at the present time, what is to be the consequence of that? We ought to have some answer from the Government to that question. Then there is the small Commission on Public Works. We know what that means. I have heard with some satisfaction the language of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool on the attempt to bribe the Irish people by dangling before them this bribe. That experiment has been tried a great many times and for a great many years. There were times in which it was successful; but there is one feature now—and I think we ought to acknowledge it to the Irish people now—that it is impossible to bribe the Irish people by gold to abandon their national aspirations. If that attempt is made by the Government it will, in my opinion, absolutely fail. The last point is that of local government. That, too, the noble Lord thinks can be satisfactorily dealt with by itself. There was a topic which the noble Lord did not deal with, and that is the question of the existing system of administration in Ireland, which is ordinarily described as the Castle Government. Now that system of administration, I think, has been universally condemned. It has been condemned perhaps in the strongest language that has been employed on the subject by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He used very emphatic language on that subject, and said that the Government of Ireland was like the Government of Poland in respect of its administration. It has been admitted, I think, by my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) that the present system of administration in Ireland is indefensible. I have seen it stated by many Conservative speakers at the last Election that they thought it ought to be reformed; but on that great, burning, urgent question the Government are absolutely silent. They express no opinion; they hold out no expectation or hope that there are to be any reforms in the administration of Irish Government. If I were to take the speech of the noble Lord, I might describe it by a variation of the well-known phrase on the return of Louis XVIII. to France—I might say with regard to the noble Lord's declaration respecting the Government of Ireland, "There is nothing gained; there is only an English General the more." But the noble Lord proceeds to say what the Government intends to do with regard to local self-government. He said—

"The Queen's Speech of January last announced the introduction of a Bill with regard to local government in England as well as in Ireland, and considerable progress had been made with the details of that scheme when the Government were roughly and incontinently ejected from Office. Speeches made at the time by those who are Ministers now would, I think, throw a great deal of light in the direction in which Her Majesty's Government will probably work. Nothing has occurred since which would lead us in any way widely to extend the limits of the policy we then laid down. On the contrary, everything that has occurred since then has tended to confirm and strengthen us in the view we then took on the subject of local government. The great sign-posts of our policy were at that time and are still equality, similarity, and, if I may use such a word, simultaneity of treatment as far as is practicable in the development of a genuinely popular system of local government in all the four countries which form the United Kingdom."

Well, now, at all events, I must compliment the noble Lord that he has made considerable progress since last February. What is his proposal now? He says—

"We are of opinion that measures of local self-government, and of similar character and at the same moment, should be introduced for all the four countries."

What was his language last year?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Exactly the same.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Ah, no! This is what he said on the 21st of January—

"I do not know whether, in the course of time, a change may come over Ireland which may possibly encourage the Government to press forward upon the attention of Parliament a measure such as I have described; but this I will say, that the present state of Ireland is not, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, one which would be favourable to the consideration of a measure for establishing local government in Ireland."—3 Hansard, 302, 180.

And yet he says that is exactly the same as he said last night. In the Queen's Speech of January there was a broad distinction drawn between the recommendations of local government for Great Britain and for Ireland. In that Speech it was said—

"Bills will be presented to you for transferring to representative bodies in the counties of Great Britain local business that is now transacted by Courts of Quarter Sessions and other authorities."

But what was there said about Ireland?—

"A measure for the reform of county government in Ireland is already in preparation."

Now that was said one day, and the very next day the noble Lord gets up and says that—

"In the opinion of the Government, the state of Ireland is not one which would be favourable to the consideration of any measure extending local government to Ireland."

The condition of Ireland has so much improved under our administration that now the noble Lord thinks it is favourable to the consideration of such a question. The real truth is that after our policy they must introduce a measure of local self-government, and that is the explanation of the change which has taken place. Well, so much for the "simultaneity" of the policy. But it is to be "similar and equal" to the local self-government to be proposed for England and Scotland. I challenge that principle. I believe it to be an absolutely false principle. I believe it to be impolitic and unstatesmanlike. I say that from an authority which the noble Lord will possibly respect. I will read it first and will tell him afterwards who the author is—

"Justice to Ireland is said to mean identity. I believe that to be the greatest folly that can be brought forward. I have always thought that the greatest cause of the misery in Ireland was an identity of institutions with England, and I venture to lay down as a principle that the government of Ireland should be on a system the reverse of that in England."

Those are the words of Lord Beaconsfield—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: About forty years ago.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Ah, yes; about the age of the noble Lord. Nevertheless I believe the words to be perfectly true. But I will read another authority to the noble Lord, not in 1843, but in the year 1885—

"A local authority is more exposed to temptations and has more facility for enabling the majority to be unjust to the minority than is the case where the authority derives its sanction from and extends its power over a wide area."

Now, mark, that is one of the weaknesses of a local authority; but—

"in a large central authority the wisdom of the several parts of the country will correct the folly and mistakes of one. In a local authority that correction is to a much greater extent wanting, and it would be impossible to leave that out of sight in an extension of any such local authority to Ireland."

That is the opinion of Lord Salisbury himself. Founding myself, then, on the authority of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury, I denounce the principle of identity and similarity of institutions as between England and Ireland as absurd. Why, what was the principle of the Union with Scotland? What would have become of the Union with Scotland if there had been men unstatesmanlike enough in those days to say that the principle of the Union with Scotland should involve similarity of institutions as between Scotland and England? Every institution of local government and of everything else—of law, of the defence of land, of every principle of government in Scotland—is different from the principle of government in England, and I say that if you should endeavour to apply your principle of similarity of institutions to Scotland as you threaten to apply them to Ireland you would create a rebellion. Scotland never has tolerated, and never will tolerate, such a principle as that enunciated by the noble Lord. The very essence of local government is that it should accommodate itself to local habits and sympathies, and to the peculiar feelings and particular wants of the population. A greater, a more conspicuous error than to impose a system of local self-government in a cast-iron frame upon the four different Nationalities within the United Kingdom it is impossible to conceive. Therefore, I again challenge that principle of local government. I have quoted two Conservative authorities, but I have yet another. I have used him twice. I will use him a third time. I am using him as if he were a Commission. I will give the noble Lord an opinion that is not 24 hours' old.

"I have heard a great deal lately as to the value of giving identical institutions to England and Ireland. It is a very large question, but I must say it is true only up to a certain point. Ireland does not want the same institutions. Ireland cannot bear them, and to force them on her may not only be useless but harmful."

That is the opinion of the last Tory Lord Lieutenant. It is the opinion of every man who knows Ireland. To give Ireland the same or similar institutions to England is exactly to give her the very thing which she does not want and most detests. But I will not detain the House too long. I fully recognize that the scheme we proposed to the House and to the country has been disapproved and been rejected; but the Gentlemen who sit on those Benches, as they have the right, so they have the duty, to propose their remedy in its place. It is our duty to examine the principle upon which that scheme is founded. If I can understand them, they are opposed to every principle for which the Liberal Party has ever contended. I come, then, to the conclusion of the noble Lord, that the verdict of the country upon our scheme is irreversible; but he accompanied it with a qualification which considerably relieved my mind—"until it is appealed against." Why, obviously every verdict is irreversible until it is appealed against; but it is against that verdict that we intend and shall continue to appeal. Not for the details of that scheme which we propounded, but for the principle of it, do I contend. That principle is to restore social order to Ireland by giving to Ireland the form of government which will secure the loyalty, the affection, and the obedience of the Queen's Irish subjects, and it is the only principle through which social order can be restored. With reference to the Land Question, until we see the proposals of the Government, it is impossible to say anything more definitely, except to point out the danger and unwisdom of delaying any attempt to settle it. With reference to local self-government, I am bound to say that I think the principle of the scheme of the Government, whose notion of forcing upon Ireland what they dare not force upon Scotland—identity of institutions—is likewise most unstatesmanlike. Our scheme has been condemned before it was tried; if the scheme of the Government is tried, it will be condemned because it was founded upon a great error of fundamental principle and because in the method in which it was attempted to be applied it was altogether inapplicable and impracticable.

Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) said, he claimed the attention of the House while, as a Belfast Representative, he made a reply to observations directed to the state of affairs in that town. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced yesterday that Her Majesty Government were prepared to appoint a Commission to conduct a solemn and impartial inquiry, taking the evidence of reluctant witnesses on oath, in order that the state of Belfast and the origin of the lamentable riots that had saddened the hearts of the citizens might be thoroughly investigated; and he (Mr. Johnston) had no fear as to the results of such an inquiry. Notwithstanding this promised inquiry, the hon. Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy) last night had introduced a sectarian view and opinion into his observations on the subject, and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had followed that up by an accusation against a most loyal Organization, to which he (Mr. Johnston) had the honour to belong. The real commencement of the riots at Belfast, on June 4, was an attack on a Protestant workman, who was told in emphatic terms by his Roman Catholic fellow-labourers that when the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, then Prime Minister, was passed, not a Protestant would be allowed to earn his living in Ireland. On the 7th of June, thank God, that Bill was rejected by Parliament. On the 8th of June a Presbyterian congregation, meeting in Albert Street Church, situated within that part of Belfast the hon. Member for South Sligo (Mr. Sexton) claims to represent, was attacked by a Roman Catholic mob. The windows of their place of worship were broken, and from that day to this that congregation had not been able to offer to God in their own church the services of their religion. This was the origin of the disturbances in Belfast. He had no doubt that in the investigation which was about to be instituted, and which he was sure would be conducted with impartiality and ability, the true facts of the case would be brought out as he had stated them to the House of Commons. The Rev. Mr. Montgomery, the pastor of the congregation—no partizan nor member of the Orange Society—had had to complain to the Constabulary of Belfast that he was not protected in the religious observances within his own church. His congregation was attacked Sunday after Sunday, when going to their place of worship. Youths going to prepare for the Communion of the Presbyterian Church were assaulted, and one seriously injured. On the 15th of August—a day which was known in Ireland as Lady Day, and which was sometimes devoted to the services of religion, and sometimes to riot—the Rev. Mr. Montgomery had to leave his own church and worship in the Ulster Hall—a place not usually devoted to religious services, but where congregations driven from their own place of worship sometimes found a refuge. Again, the Rev. Dr. Hanna, of St. Enoch's Presbyterian Church, organized a Sunday-school excursion for the children and members of his congregation. It was usual for such excursions to be accompanied by bands of music and banners bearing texts of Scripture. That there might be no excuse given for disturbance by the assembling of the young people, they were desired to break up into parties and retire to their homes unaccompanied by the usual musical demonstration. Unfortunately, one band did not observe these regulations, and met with rough treatment. Bands played without molestation on the Sabbath Day in Dublin and Cork and elsewhere in Ireland; but a band could not go through the streets of Belfast accompanying a Sunday-school excursion, without the sensitive feelings of the defeated Home Rule Party being excited into such a state that they became a riotous mob. He (Mr. Johnston) had listened that day with interest to the Question of the hon. Member for South Sligo, as to whether the noble Lord proposed that the inquiry about to be held should embrace the aims and objects of the Orange Society. As one of the oldest officials of that Society, he unhesitatingly said that they challenged the most thorough and complete investigation into their aims and objects. The books of the Society were at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government, and the whole Organization, from its inception to its present position, was ready to be submitted to the most entire and impartial scrutiny. Accusations had been made against the Orange Society, and statements had been made in the House of Commons, that were completely without foundation, and it was believed that by the constant reiteration of coloured and heated statements the average Englishman would be induced by-and-by to credit them. Slanders repeated time after time, and possibly not contradicted, were calculated to do irreparable injury to a loyal body of men in Ireland. In connection with the subject, he would relate to the House a personal reminiscence on the feelings that existed in the city. On July 13th there was the laying of the foundation stone of an Orange hall in Belfast. On that occasion he had the opportunity of disagreeably finding out what the feelings of some of the people were. Returning from the laying of the stone, he carried in his hands a couple of sashes, rolled up in a manner not calculated to give offence to even the most fastidious hon. Gentleman opposite. When descending from a tramcar the sashes were snatched out of his hand. He requested the magistrate before whom the case came to deal leniently with the unfortunate offender; but the man was sent to gaol for a month for the assault. If the co-religionists of hon. Gentlemen opposite could not bear to see an Orange sash, and attacked a person carrying it, was it to be wondered at that Protestant feeling was sometimes aroused, and that there was an attempt made to defend Protestants from outrage and wrong? He would ask the pardon of the House for alluding to this personal matter. He had done so simply to illustrate the position of affairs in Belfast. Then there were the riots arising after the 31st of July. They heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday an appalling account of the number of deaths, of the number of persons who suffered serious injury in those riots. It had been said that the riots were Orange riots. Would the House be surprised to hear that out of the 200 wounded only about 10 per cent were members of the Roman Catholic Party? The noble Lord, in his character of Leader of the Government in this House, probably was right in defending the character and position of the Royal Irish Constabulary; but he (Mr. Johnston) asserted, and it would be proved at the investigation, that the Royal Irish Constabulary were severely disturbed by the Home Rule measures introduced by the late Government. The Constabulary believed they were about to be handed over in a new régime to other parties, and they came down, as would be proved from the statements upon oath of some of them, determined to make an attack upon the Protestants of Belfast, to the injury of the reputation of that loyal town. He was jealous of the reputation of Belfast, for while other portions of Ireland were in poverty and wretchedness, in riot and rebellion, Belfast was loyal and true to the British Empire. He declared his conviction that a conspiracy was entered into to degrade Belfast in the estimation of the Empire and the inhabitants of the civilized world. Some of its citizens had been provoked, and outrage and wrong had been done; the Constabulary, in many instances, breaking loose from their officers, and, disobeying orders, fired shot after shot upon peaceable and unoffending citizens. A young scholar, going home from Sunday-school, by streets in which he thought he was not likely to be attacked, was singled out and shot dead with the Bible in his hand. Was it to be wondered at that, in these circumstances, the Protestants of Belfast lost confidence in the Constabulary? He had seen a letter from a constable, in which the writer said that, after a certain transaction which took place in the town, he was ashamed to go about in a constable's uniform and look civilians in the face; and he (Mr. Johnston) was informed that on one occasion, when the Royal Irish Constabulary were about to fire on a peaceable crowd of persons, an officer in command of a portion of Her Majesty's troops—a portion of a Highland regiment—told the Constabulary that if they fired in the direction in which it seemed they intended to fire, the troops would fire upon them. There was some justification for the allegation that if there had been wrong done by some in Belfast who bore the name of Protestants, they were not to blame for the origin of the disturbance. If there had been life lost, if innocent persons had died, if murders had been done, those who were the guiltiest persons, and who, if there was an impartial investigation, would assuredly be brought to justice, were not the Protestants or Orangemen of Belfast. If hon. Members opposite had confined themselves to a general discussion as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, he would not—for it would not have been his duty—have entered into these details; but, under the circumstances, he should not be worthy to represent one of the noblest cities in Her Majesty's Dominions—a city that would yet wipe out the stain that had been sought to be placed upon its escutcheon—if he remained silent in the House of Commons when accusations completely without foundation were levelled against its fair fame and reputation. It was said yesterday by the hon. Member for North Dublin, that instead of the Government consulting with the Mayor of Belfast as to the peace of the city, the Mayor of Belfast ought to be placed upon his trial for the outrages. ["Hear, hear."] He saw the hon. Member acknowledged the accuracy of the quotation. He (Mr. Johnston) was prepared to defend the Mayor of Belfast from this baseless accusation—an accusation which he was confident the hon. Member would not have made if he had known the high and honourable character of the gentleman whom he misrepresented. Her Majesty's late Government singled out that gentleman for the honour of Knighthood, and it was reserved for the Conservative Government to add to the honour by conferring a Baronetcy upon him. There was, therefore, complete unanimity of opinion between the two sides of the House as to the desirability of conferring honour upon a man who, by his intelligence and his industry, by his position as head of the shipbuilding interest in Belfast, had done more, perhaps, than any other man in Ireland to raise the character and position of the town, and to benefit and develop the industrial resources of Ireland. In conclusion, he would express the hope, earnest and sincere, that the days of riot and outrage in Belfast were over, and he was sure the House would join with him in the earnest prayer that peace and happiness, truth and justice, would prevail for all time to come in the city which he had the honour to represent in the House of Commons.

Mr. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) said, he hoped the House would consider seriously the policy of eviction which the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer had encouraged the landlords to carry out next winter. He Mr. Hayden had received a mandate from his constituency to protest against any such policy. He had been assured by the people of the district that the consequences of such a policy would be most deplorable, because there could be no doubt it would tend to exasperate the Irish people. Up to recently they had been encouraged to wait for better times. That state of things would be changed, and now they would think that they had nothing to hope for by attempting any longer to meet the unjust demands of the landlords. The demands that were now made upon the tenants for rent were not met by the produce of the land, but by loans from shopkeepers, banks, and by remittances from America. They were told that Irish agitation was supported by the latter. Irish agitation, to his knowledge, had not received during the whole of its existence so much American money as the landlords had in six months, and had not the people been assisted by their hard-working brethren in America, the landlords could not by enforcing any forms of the law have obtained the rents which they had received. If the landlords were encouraged to evict the tenants, did they expect to be able to get rents, or set their land? Would any man in his senses take at the same rent a holding from which the evicted tenant, through no fault of his own, had been unable to make a living? The tenants now were almost reduced to starvation; and if the present weather continued, the position of the unfortunate tenant would be miserable. The Irish Party would not again send round the hat to save the people. It was done by them before, and their Leader said it never could be done again. Some means, however, should be devised to protect the tenant in the crisis which seemed inevitably approaching. The Chancellor of the Exchequer showed his utter ignorance of the real state of Ireland when he encouraged the Irish landlords to a policy of eviction by promising them the aid of the soldiers and the police. To propose that the present state of things should go on until next spring, when the Commission would be appointed, was absurd. Was the suggested guarantee for the purchase-money to be given by Boards, which would be controlled by such Gentlemen as the right hon. and gallant Colonel Colonel King-Harman), in whom the tenants had no confidence, and who, in proposing the adoption of the Address, showed his characteristic vindictiveness towards the Irish people and the Irish Party, though there was a time when he Mr. Hayden stood on the same platform with him advocating Home Rule? This Gentleman was a member of various Local Boards, and were he and his friends to be allowed to pledge the credit of the Irish people in order to get high prices for their estates, and by then, as it was stated they would do, quitting the country, leaving the people who remained behind to bear all the responsibility for the extravagant prices given? If the policy indicated were carried out throughout the winter, did they think it would settle the Irish Question? No; but it would leave a feeling of exasperation, and a desire for retaliation at some future time. Did they not see that such a policy would tend to delay, and render any settlement of the Irish Question far more difficult? He demanded that the voice of Ireland should be considered. No one wished more than the Irish Members to see social order established in Ireland; but when all their efforts to keep down crime were met by the traditional policy of the Tory Party, coercion, it would be their duty, for weal or woe, to stand by the people in doing their duty, and take whatever risks there might be attached to the policy which the Irish people would follow. At the beginning of the year they had hoped that the long standing quarrel between the two countries and two peoples was about to be brought to an end, and that a better feeling had arisen. All such hopes were now shattered for the time. But the Irish people had long memories, and if the Government pursued the policy indicated, its acts would have no authority in Ireland. It was incredible that such a policy could be adopted in the 19th century. It was a brutal policy. It meant that the tenant should have no protection, and that the landlord should have every encouragement to evict. He hoped, in the interests of peace, that even yet better counsels would prevail with the Government, and that that would not be the case; but if it were, the responsibility for the consequences would rest, not with the Irish Members, but with Her Majesty's Government.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S. said, he wished to refer to the speech which had been delivered by the hon. Member for South Belfast Mr. Johnston, and to hope also that the peace and prosperity of Belfast would be unimpaired by the late riots. He denied that the aggression in the first instance came from the Catholics. It was accepted all over the Kingdom as a fact that the Catholics, far from provoking the Orangemen, kept strictly within the law; they went to their homes when requested to do so; but the loyal Orangemen were allowed to manifest the strength of their loyalty by shooting down the policemen, by stoning them, and giving them a taste of what they called their "kidneys." As to the Mayor of Belfast, what would be said of an employer who should allow his stores to be plundered day after day, in order that his workmen might arm themselves with nuts and bolts to throw at the police? His workmen, had in fact, been screwed up to fight; and he hoped the Mayor of Belfast would not bolt from the inquiry which was about to be instituted. Passing to the proposed treatment of Ireland by the present Government, he said it was as well that they should see what the real condition of the country was. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the right hon. Gentleman the author of the Land Act had promised that the Act would be a final settlement of the Land Question. But it should be remembered, on the other hand, that, in season and out of season, the Irish Members had told the House that the Bill was faulty and incomplete, and the judicial rents had been described by the Irish Leader as judicial rack-rents. If that was an accurate description of them four years ago, how much more accurate was it now, when that foreign competition, which was only beginning then, had become so acute? He considered that the rents fixed four years ago were 40 per cent over what it was possible for the tenants to pay now—he believed 100 per cent would be nearer it. During the last season, butter had been sold in the Irish market at something like an average of 5d. per lb., and a few years ago it used to fetch 1s. 5d. and 1s. 6d. As for store cattle, they were bought in the spring of this year at a higher price than could be obtained for them in any market in the Kingdom. It was the same with grain and oats. If butter and store cattle were the only commodities from which the Irish farmer could win his rent, it was impossible for the landlords to expect that their tenants could make it. He would respectfully suggest that there should be an all-round suspension of rent until next spring; the landlords should only be entitled to claim legally 25 per cent of the rent next spring from the farmer, and there should be a concurrent law that there would be a like protection for the landlords from the creditors. If the landlords pushed the tenants to extremities, he did not think he would be acting right if he did not tell the House that the tenants, driven to despair, would be forced to acts of reprisal and resistance, and things would be done which every lover of order in the country would deplore. If the landlords pursued this course, how would the Government benefit them? They would be simply adding more land to that which was already lying on their hands. He said distinctly that the country was almost on the verge of bankruptcy, owing to the reverses of the farmers and foreign competition. Against a policy of eviction the Irish Members would do their utmost, and see that the tenants who suffered had something in their pockets to support themselves and families. There was no finality in the verdict the country had given with respect to Home Rule. In a short time they hoped to have another appeal to the country and to get the verdict reversed. In the meantime, they would do their best to restrain their people; but he was bound to say he should advise his constituents to meet their landlords with a passive resistance until such time as they extorted from them such concessions as would enable them to live on their holdings. Coercion Acts were now out of the question; for the Irish Members would offer continuous and determined opposition to their enactment; and, beyond that, the Irish Members had the support in their demands of three-fourths of the people and of Irishmen throughout the world.

Mr. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he could not help expressing his surprise and regret that the Speech from the Throne made no reference to the question of Burmah. It was a speech remarkable not so much for what it said as for what it had omitted. Last night the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer had informed the House that everything that had happened in Burmah had been quite according to his expectations. He pointed out that it took 10 years to pacify and conquer Lower Burmah, and said that the difficulties of conquering Upper Burmah would not be less than those which had presented themselves in Lower Burmah. He (Mr. Hunter) must say that if that was the opinion of the noble Lord seven months ago, when he was Secretary of State for India, he had succeeded in maintaining a very masterly reticence on the subject. Nothing of the kind was hinted at seven months ago, when the noble Lord congratulated himself and the Government of which he was a Member on the great triumph they had achieved in Burmah. It was a pity that he had given no hint to the authorities in India of the difficulties which they were likely to encounter. The account given of the state of the country by The Times Correspondent, whose veracity and accuracy had been proved in connection with the executions in Burmah, was far from encouraging. The effect upon trade had not been what was anticipated. On the contrary, the state of trade in Burmah was very much worse now than it had been before; and, if the noble Lord was right, a long period of expectation must elapse before the Manchester merchant could hope to sell his goods in Upper Burmah. The state of the country was such that the British name was hated, not only among the criminal classes, but among reasonable and law-abiding citizens. The number of troops in the country was at least twice as great as the original estimate. The history of our dealings with that unfortunate country, in fact, was much the same as that of other annexations. First, the cupidity of the British merchant, anxious to secure a fresh market, was excited. Next, the Exeter Hall sentiment was worked up, and we were told what an awful monster King Theebaw was. Then the annexation stage was reached, and we were invited to extend the blessings of civilization. Finally, the Burmese were said to be longing to be rid of their tyrant, and anxious to destroy their own independence. But, until a recent date, the Government of India had strength of mind enough to resist all these importunities. At last, however, the French were brought on the scene, and the Indian Government could no longer resist the forces which were carrying us on to war. The result was the present anarchical state of things, which had been so graphically described by The Times Correspondent; but there was no real ground for the fear of French intervention. The French could not have conquered the country, and the French Chamber would never have sanctioned an attempt to do so. ["Oh, oh!"] He held that there was no ground for the fear that Upper Burmah might be conquered by the French. We had a base of operations at Rangoon, and means of communication into the very heart of Upper Burmah, and we had also plenty of Indian troops ready to hand. When we considered how small was the progress which we had made in the last nine months, although we possessed these great advantages, it must be acknowledged that it was ridiculous to suppose that the French, whose base was at Tonquin, could even have approached to the measure of success which we had attained. It was perfectly clear that, at the present moment, the civil administration and the administration of justice in Burmah, as well as the military situation, were of a very unsatisfactory character. The question had been considered by the Indian Government some time ago whether Burmah should be annexed, or whether a Native Prince should be set up under the direction of the British authorities. He could understand that there were many objections to the appointment of a Native Prince; but the adoption of such a plan would remove one enormous difficulty out of our way, since Burmah was one of the few places in which the right divine of Kings was still devoutly recognized, and was a law to the people. If the enormous power which that belief supplied could be utilized to the pacification of Burmah, an inexpensive and bloodless settlement of the difficulty might be expected. If it were the case that we had 30,000 men in Burmah, or anything like that number, it was obvious that the original estimate of the cost of annexation at £300,000 must be very largely exceeded. In view of the arduous work which still lay before us, the cost of the occupation must come to a very large sum; and he trusted the Government would seriously consider the propriety of paying at least a share of that expense from the Exchequer of this country. He hoped they would not add to the other mistakes which they had already committed in connection with this Expedition to Burmah the inexcusable meanness of making the poor people of India pay for the opening up of markets for the merchants of Manchester and London. There was one other portion of the Address on which he wished to say a few words. The remarks in the Queen's Speech with reference to the verdict of the country on the Irish Question he did not complain of as being inaccurate; but he thought they might well be considered to be very incomplete. It was quite true that, on the whole, a large majority of Members had been returned opposed to the Irish measures of the late Government; but it was equally true, as well as being a fact of some significance—and he recommended it to those who had haggled to their bosoms the doctrine of finality—that if they measured the verdict of the country by nations and not by votes, there were three nations in favour of Home Rule, while there was only one against it. With reference to Scotland, he thought he could explain—to some extent, at all events—the secret of that opinion. The attachment of Scotland to the Union was above suspicion. With reference to all Imperial matters, for every matter of offence or of defence the people of Scotland did not regard themselves in any other light than as one and the same with the people of England, equally ready and proud to bear their share of the Imperial burdens. But for many years past there had been a growing feeling among the people in Scotland that they failed to get that justice and that attention from the Imperial Parliament which they thought was their due, and to which they were justly entitled. He believed that long before now that feeling would have manifested itself in the form of a demand for Home Rule for Scotland, if it had not been owing to that very strong attachment which they had to the Imperial Union, which made them prefer even the injury of their separate interests rather than any proposal which might involve peril to Imperial unity. But the discussion that had taken place with regard to Ireland had undoubtedly had the effect of educating the minds of many of the electors of Scotland, and he would mention the two principal features in the Irish proposals of the late Government which, in his experience, proved attractive to the Scotch elector. In the first place, the principle of the Bill that there should be a Legislative Assembly, having authority over all matters exclusively and specifically Irish, the electors said was exactly what they wanted for Scotland, with the substitution of the word "Scotland" for "Ireland." To restrict the Imperial Parliament to strictly Imperial Business, and to have a National Assembly which would have the exclusive control of Scotch affairs, seemed to them to be the precise remedy for which they had been so long in search, reconciling their separate interests as a nation with the unity of the Empire. In their view, national autonomy was not opposed to Imperial unity. On the contrary, national autonomy, in the present state of circumstances, was the only foundation on which Imperial unity could permanently repose. There was another feature of the measure which proved very attractive. It would be remembered that, although two Orders were to be established in the National Assembly of Ireland, there was no House of Lords invented for the benefit of the Irish people; and he observed that amidst the shower of criticism that assailed the Bill from every quarter, no one ever complained that the Bill was defective because it did not supply them with a House of Lords. That was a feature which eminently recommended a similar Bill to the minds of the Scottish people. They were perfectly willing to resign any right, or share, or interest that they might be supposed to have in that illustrious Assembly; and if the people of England thought they were not capable of managing their own affairs without the assistance of irresponsible and hereditary legislators, the Scotch were quite willing to make them a present of the whole Assembly. And not only that, but they would cheerfully give up the Scotch Peers in addition. What was the present position of Scotland with reference to its own Government? The Government of Scotland was in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour). Scotland had good reason to dread the consequences of that untoward event. The right hon. Gentleman had the patronage of all the public offices, and of many of the Chairs in the Universities. They had had experience of Tory Governments in Scotland, and they knew that the maxim which governed all their patronage, great or small, was that "No Liberal need apply." To possess Liberal opinions in a country which returned five-sixths of its Members as Liberals was a fatal disqualification in the eyes of a Tory Government. They were a very patient people in Scotland; but the constant observance of maxims of that kind might try their patience too much. The grievances of Scotland were of a somewhat different kind, no doubt, from those of which they had heard so much in the case of Ireland; but they were, none the less, of a serious and practical character. The mischief that had been done to Scotland through its being associated with England in its local legislation was incalculable. He might adduce, as an instance, a subject which held the very highest place in the intelligent appreciation of Scotchmen—he meant the subject of education. There were many deficiencies to be provided for in the educational system of Scotland, which arose simply from the connection of Scotland with England in the matter of education; and he believed that if they had had a Scotch Parliament in 1850 there would have been no arrears to overtake, or any educational deficiencies to provide for. In 1854 the Scottish people desired to remedy this crying evil, and Mr. (now Lord) Moncrieff introduced a Bill into Parliament; but it was rejected by an English majority, though the majority of the Scottish Members were in favour of it. The reason for that was given by Lord Moncrieff, when he said it was rejected because the English people were afraid it would be an example for England. In the following year, he Mr. Hunter must do the House the justice to say that they repented of their action, and passed a Bill on the same lines; but it was destroyed in "another place," and the result was that for a period of 18 years tens of thousands of children in Scotland were brought up ignorant of the rudimentary arts of reading and writing, because the English people willed that it should be so. At the present time, even, the interests of Scotland were seriously sacrificed by its connection with England in regard to education. The mechanical system of teaching and examination which prevailed in the elementary schools was a serious evil. In regard to England it might be a necessary evil; but in regard to Scotland it was an unmitigated mischief, and it was wholly unnecessary. It stunted the growth of the pupils' minds, and it lowered the noble profession of teaching to the level of a mechanical trade. Then, again, how disastrous had been the influence of the English majority upon ecclesiastical questions in Scotland. At present he could desire no signs of repentance or amendment on the part of the English Members in regard to their interference in Scotch ecclesiastical questions. No later than last year the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs Mr. Finlay, introduced an Ecclesiastical Bill for Scotland. It was in the opinion of many Scotchmen a mean and mischievous attempt to create ecclesiastical squabbles in Scotland, and set two of the leading Presbyterian denominations by the ears. A majority of Scotch Members—36 against 14—also voted against that Bill, but there was a majority of nearly 40 English Members in favour of the Bill; and the Bill would have been carried, in spite of Scotch opinion, if it had not been for a casual majority of Welsh and Irish Members. In this new Parliament they could not hope for the same success by which to neutralize a large majority of English Members, and therefore Ecclesiastical Scotland lay at the present moment helpless at the feet of the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs and his Tory and Episcopalian allies. In fact, the same thing that happened in regard to education was being repeated in regard to the Church. The English Members were afraid of the example of Scotland, and thus the ecclesiastical peace of Scotland was ruthlessly sacrificed to the interest of the Established Church in England. He would refer to another case, which occurred no later than last Session. He meant the legislation with regard to the crofters. For many years past the grievances of the crofters had been just as great as they were when they invited the attention of Her Majesty's Government; but it was not until some of them began to make their opinions known by resisting the officers of the law that any notice was taken by the Government of those grievances. Even when the Government did move in the matter, the measure they introduced was of the most truncated character and adapted to the taste of the English palate—in fact, he did not believe any Minister would have dared to present such a measure to a Scotch Assembly—and when Amendments were proposed that would have improved the Bill, they were rejected by an English majority, who altogether set aside Scottish opinion. To his mind, the direction of men's thoughts in Scotland was tending to a real, not a sham autonomy, and the suggestion that a Scottish Assembly should consider measures applicable to Scotland, which should afterwards be subject to the veto of an English majority was an idle one, as it would merely be an appeal from Philip drunk

to Philip sober. It was felt that when the opinion of Scotland had been ascertained and expressed, it should not be subjected to mutilation by an English Assembly. It had been said that one of the gravest consequences of establishing autonomy in Scotland would be to create a diversity and conflict of law. The answer to that was that Scotland had already her own laws and institutions, and although Scotland had been so closely associated with England for nearly 200 years, yet the assimilation of the Scotch law to the English was just as remote and distant as it was 200 years ago. In a very few years, if they had a Scotch Parliament, Scotland would advance by leaps and bounds. The Scotch people who shrank from no sacrifices in the cause of education would, in a very few years, provide Scotland with the best and most perfect system of education that was to be found in the whole world. Left to themselves, the Scotch people would soon settle their ecclesiastical difficulties; left to themselves, they would soon make progress with temperance legislation; aye, and even the Land Question would not be too hard a nut for a Scotch Assembly to crack. In 10 years, left to themselves, they were capable of making more progress than they could possibly hope to attain in this Parliament in the course of 50 years. But the emancipation of Scotland from the trammels that impeded her intelligence and restricted her progress was to be accomplished, not by weakening, but by strengthening the Imperial Parliament for Imperial purposes. If the work of the Imperial Parliament were confined to strictly Imperial Business, there would be no difficulty in the way of admitting Representatives of the Colonies which might be affiliated one by one. One of the great advantages of the educational process which they had recently undergone had been that it familiarized people with the way autonomy might be reconciled with Imperial unity. Were such a system adopted, the Imperial Parliament would gain in the important article of time, for at present Imperial questions were as much neglected as local and national work. We are always attempting to drive several omnibuses through Temple Bar at the same time. How anomalous and full of danger was the relations of the Imperial Parliament to India. We handed over the Government of India to a bureaucracy of Englishmen, who in India were birds of passage, and who naturally aimed at making as much money as they could, and returning home as quickly as possible. If we had an Imperial Parliament there would be more time than there was now for the discussion of Indian, Colonial, and Foreign, and Military and Naval affairs. This was the direction in which the mind of the people of Scotland was now going. Their attachment to the Union was above suspicion; and they thought they had discovered a process, exemplified in the United States, in Germany, and in our Colonies, whereby the separate interests of Scotland could be thoroughly reconciled with Imperial unity, and whereby the Imperial Parliament could be made a fit instrument for the momentous interests intrusted to its care.

Mr. J. STUART Shoreditch, Hoxton, said, he shared the astonishment of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) at the remarks of the noble Lord the Leader of the House with respect to the annexation of Burmah. It was at first brought before the House as a remarkable triumph of Conservative diplomacy, and as an annexation effected without bloodshed and in an inexpensive manner, and one of which England would have been deprived by the timidity of the Radicals. We now found that in the eyes of those who devised it the undertaking was at the first contemplated as one that it would take many years to carry out, and had turned out to be a costly and difficult enterprize. Coming to the question of Ireland and to Home Rule, it was satisfactory to him to believe that one of the results of the discussions in the late Parliament, and since, must be to give a great impulse in Scotland to the demand for self-government there. He could not see what there was in the demand, whether it was for Ireland, Scotland, Wales, or England itself, other than the carrying out of the principle of democracy, to which we were more and more advancing, of allowing people to manage their own affairs. He objected to the idea of placing those National Governments, which before long would be established, too much under the surveillance and supervision of the Imperial Parliament. The noble Lord the Leader of the House intrenched himself behind the Land Act of 1881, although the Party to which he belonged opposed it; but the Tory Party was generally defending a penultimate state of things. He wondered what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) now thought of the situation, so far as the question of the land was concerned. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman was acting as the lieutenant of the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and that both of these right hon. Gentlemen supported, and were much in love with, the present Government. It would appear, therefore, that the purchase of Irish land was only to be condemned when the proposal emanated from the Head of the Liberal Party, and that when it was proposed by the Conservative Party it became an excellent investment. When this became evident to the Liberals throughout the country he believed it would be one of the most potent means of reuniting the Liberal Party, the dissensions in which were the only cause of the Tory Party being in power. The justice of the demand for Home Rule was every day becoming more apparent, and such a tinkering with the question as was proposed by the Government could not prove satisfactory to the people of either this country or Ireland. What was to be the result of the Inquiry of the Commission on this subject? It was said that nothing they did would give rise to legislative interference with rents. It was quite clear the object of inquiry was to be to find out whether the Irish tenant or the English taxpayer was to pay the rents of the landlords in Ireland. The supposition appeared to be that the Act of 1881 was an Act for guaranteeing and securing a certain amount of rent to Irish landlords. On the contrary, it was one for diminishing unjustly high rents. The Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury) had spoken a little more clearly than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had said—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, rising, said: Mr. Speaker, I must ask you, Sir, whether there is not a Rule of this House that quotations cannot be made of speeches delivered in the other House of Parliament in the same Session?

[Second Night.]

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a well-established Rule, and one of obvious convenience, that no reference should be made to words used in the other House of Parliament in the same Session.

Mr. J. STUART said, of course, he would at once accept this ruling; but would remark that when the policy of Her Majesty's Government was stated more fully and accurately in the other House by the Prime Minister, and when it was not possible to refer to his language, that showed the inconvenience of having the Prime Minister in the other House. He was astonished to find the Party which at the last Election placarded the walls against any attempt to buy out the Irish landlords now resort to a proposal which was based on a payment to be made out of the money of the British taxpayers. The Tories declaimed very loudly indeed against any Land Purchase scheme. As to the other Irish proposals of the Government, astonishment was expressed that the Irish Members did not readily seize upon them. The Tory Party was always giving to Ireland what Ireland did not want. They were like the lady who said to the nurse—"Go and see what baby is doing, and whatever she is doing tell her not to." The Tories always tried to discover what Ireland did not want, and then they offered it to Ireland. Such a policy could only produce exasperation and contempt. Then, as to local government, it was proposed that it should be similar for the Three Kingdoms. But the form of government should be similar only because the circumstances were similar, and the circumstances of the three countries were entirely dissimilar. In Scotland they did not want the same institutions which suited England, and he doubted whether similar local institutions would suit all parts of England itself. The demand for Home Rule in Ireland was a real, and not a got-up demand. He considered the scheme of the Government fatally defective, and certain to end in failure.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he could only describe the policy of the Government as one of reaction, of antagonism to that of the late Government, and of persecution, procrastination, and empty promises. The policy of procrastination was to be found in the issuing of Royal Commissions to make inquiries; and, indeed, when an attempt was made to realize the object and the scope of the Government policy, it was found to resolve itself into nothing more suggestive than a huge note of interrogation. He asked why all those Commissions that had been mentioned in the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) were to be appointed? They had been told that the Conservatives had no intuitive knowledge. They might be inclined to remark that the Conservative Benches were not noted for knowledge intuitive or otherwise. But surely it was a strange complaint for a Government consisting principally of hereditary legislators to make; for if hereditary legislators had not intuitive knowledge, where should one look for it? In France, political Parties were very fond of labelling their Governments with particular names. They had what was known as a Gouvernement de combat; but our present Government might fitly be described in the same nomenclature as a Gouvernement de recherche. They had been told by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) that one of these Commissions was to consist of three highly-scientific gentlemen, though he had not been able to lay his hands upon them yet. These three gentlemen were to inquire whether by an outlay of public money, and upon what reasonable terms, the material resources of Ireland could be developed, the energies of the people directed, and capital attracted into the country. The first remark upon that would be that, for a purpose such as that, no inquiry was necessary. They were all perfectly well aware that whenever money could be obtained for enterprises of any kind in Ireland, or elsewhere, results followed that developed the material resources of the country, and provided an outlet for the energies of the people; but there was this distinction—public moneys when granted in the form of pauper charity, which loans at an unbusinesslike rate of interest seemed to be, had a demoralizing effect upon the country to which those loans were made. Rather let the people of the country themselves find an outlet for their energies under a form of free self-government such as the Irish demanded. We in this country would consider the subject a good many times before we went and begged loans as a sort of charity from some foreign country to develop our resources, and the Irish people had a right to say to us—"Give us power, by our own self-governing institutions, to get what we want in the way of capital, and you will see how great will be the advantages both to our country and to yours." They wanted capital in the county of Cornwall to develop its mineral industry. If the development of the resources and industries of Ireland were to be provided for by the British taxpayer, he wanted to know whether they in this country had not a right to ask for a little of this reproductive capital, which seemed to be so abundant when the Tories were in Office, but so difficult to find when the Liberals were in power? What were they to say when they found hon. Gentlemen, who were supposed to be such resolute opponents of anything like Socialism, coming down to the House, and proclaiming as their fixed and resolute policy a course more Socialistic in its tendencies than any suggestions he had ever heard or seen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain)? They were told this scientific Commission was first of all to inquire into the deep sea fisheries; secondly, the railways and tramways; and, thirdly, arterial drainage. He was inclined to describe this Government as something almost identical in character with that of the City Commissioners of Sewers. But with respect to all these matters, about which so many months were to be wasted in idle and futile inquiry, loans were in existence at the present moment for all these purposes. In the last Report of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland they found that during the year loans amounting to £77,226 were granted for the purpose of arterial drainage; £17,700 for purposes of main drainage; and £165,000 for improving farm houses, labourers' houses, and so forth. Under these circumstances, it was a positive insult to that House to come and pretend to have a new-fangled policy, which turned out to be merely a sham, for the purpose of deluding the public and covering a policy of procrastination. Then they were to have the persecution of friends and enemies alike. They were to have a persecution against the Orangemen—the loyal Orangemen of Belfast—because they had been following a little too literally the advice and sweet counsel of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. He (Mr. Conynbeare) was in the House when the late Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) delivered that philippic against the constructive treason of the noble Lord. It was going too far, perhaps, to say that treason to-day sat in high places; but it was certainly true that the constructive traitor of last Session was to-day one of Her Majesty's most trusted and confidential Advisers. Then they were to have persecution in other forms. They were to have persecution in the districts of Kerry, because there existed there, perhaps, some "Boycotting." As if there was no "Boycotting" in any other part of the United Kingdom! When the time came, if it did come, he should be prepared to give evidence of "Boycotting" and intimidation and of wholesale ruffianism on the part of noble Lords, Primrose dames, and their followers, which would certainly vie with, if it did not cast into the shade, the "Boycotting" that existed in Kerry. Then there was another form of persecution. That was the wholesale evictions that had taken place already, were taking place, and which would take place during the long and weary months of the coming winter. In three months of the last winter 3,000 or more unfortunate people had been driven out of their homes. He had said, too, that the policy of the Government was a bundle of empty promises to Ireland. They promised to give a great deal to Ireland at the expense of the British taxpayer, and this was to be undertaken by a Government of Gentlemen who came into Office, he was going to say, by a fluke, but who had certainly reached their present position through misrepresentations against Her Majesty's late Government. He was not accusing hon. Gentlemen opposite of it. He said they reached their present position by falsehoods and misrepresentations scattered wholesale throughout the country by their supporters. In a remote district of his own constituency the labourers were informed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had introduced his Land Purchase Bill because he was a great landowner in Ireland, and wished to get rid of his estates there on favourable terms. These Gentlemen had got into Office by reason of the panic they instilled into the minds of a great portion of the English electorate, and by telling them they would, as the result of Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy, be saddled with taxation to the extent of £150,000,000, or about £30 a-head all round. One of his (Mr. Conybeare's) Colleagues in Cornwall—the hon. Member for the Truro Division (Mr. Bickford-Smith)—stated that himself; and he (Mr. Conybeare) dared say the hon. Member was only a sample of others. And these Gentlemen having won their election by denouncing a scheme which they had never understood thoroughly—they did not understand it thoroughly, or they would have seen it involved no risk whatever to the British taxpayer—these Gentlemen now came to ask them to sanction a policy of handing over untold millions without any security at all. But the scheme of the Government would certainly necessitate the expenditure of many millions of English money. The Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury), a short time ago, had denounced the late Government for attempting to establish an independent Parliament. If the noble Marquess had understood the Bill, he would have known that the Bill would have done nothing of the kind. The Government had suggested a general local government scheme, which he supposed was intended to conciliate those quondam Home Rulers, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Mover of the Address (Colonel King-Harman) and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Henry Matthews). He should be surprised to find such a plan supported by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), who had abandoned his own plan of a National Council because it lacked the essential element of success—namely, the acceptance of the Irish people themselves. The policy of the Government appeared to be to offer the Irish people alms and inquiries for which there was no need, but to deny them the one thing that they asked for, and which men holding Radical views must desire to see granted. Of course, it must be borne in mind that the Government were in a very peculiar position. They could not keep their places upon the Treasury Bench without the assistance of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. The recent Elections, however, had shown how diminished was the political influence of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He went down to Cardiff to give his aid in the attempt to oust a Member of the late Government; but that hon. Member was returned with a majority greater than before. The right hon. Gentleman wrote letters to his constituents in Cornwall with a view of assisting his Tory opponent; but he was returned by a majority more than treble. The right hon. Gentleman had no doubt shown that he retained some influence in Birmingham, upon which he had imposed as one of its Members a Tory Home Rule Home Secretary. But there were manifest signs that his influence outside of Birmingham was very slight. The country could not understand the consistency of those who, having emphatically condemned the Purchase Bill of the late Government, and declared that they would be no party to placing a financial burden on the British taxpayer for such a purpose, now supported the policy of the Government, which included a Purchase Scheme involving the heaviest burdens upon the taxpayers of this country. The right hon. Gentleman had a Land Purchase Scheme of his own, which had been printed and laid before the Cabinet, and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had challenged him to make it public; but the right hon. Member for West Birmingham refused, not unnaturally, since it would have shown that his own scheme was worse than the Purchase Scheme of the late Government in all those points in respect of which he attacked the Ministerial measure. A great deal had been said about the final and irrevocable verdict of the constituencies; but there was no such thing as finality in politics. The Act of Union was considered final; but it was nevertheless altered—and altered in an important particular—when the Irish Church was disestablished. At that time the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) and his friends went about denouncing the Queen.

Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) said, he had already denied that allegation.

Mr. CONYBEARE said, he was referring to resolutions passed at meetings at which the hon. Gentleman was present.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: Quote the resolution.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he had not the exact words; but the resolutions were to the effect that if the Queen gave her assent to the Act for the disestablishment of the Irish Church she would be violating her Coronation Oath. The cardinal feature of the policy of the Government was that evictions were not to be discontinued. There was to be no mercy shown to the unfortunate tenants. What, he wondered, would the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) say to that, who had last Session urged so strongly the passing of a measure to suspend evictions? On the other hand, this was to be said—that the Democracy of Great Britain and the Democracy of Ireland had embraced each other; that they had clasped hands across the silver streak that separated the Sister Islands; and they did not mean to give up the struggle until the principles of freedom and self-government had been established in Ireland—those principles which they were still fighting to establish in their full splendour in this country. That curse to this country, that incubus in the form of hereditary obstruction, which still existed, they meant to fight against shoulder to shoulder with the Democracy of Ireland, for the purpose first of establishing Home Rule there, and then getting rid of the obstructions in the way of the full aspirations of the Democracy of England.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.): As the Representative of an almost purely agricultural constituency in Ireland, I think it is desirable that I should add my indignant protest to those already made against the remarks which have been addressed to the House by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have no hesitation in saying that the policy enunciated by the noble Lord was received in Ireland this morning with the most intense indignation. I have no doubt that it is regarded by five-sixths of the population of Ireland as a policy of cowardice and evasion. I believe that the tenantry of Ireland recognize, and that the people of England also should recognize, in that declaration of policy that the landlord's interest is the only interest that is to be considered. If the Government had deliberately set about fashioning a policy which would tend to exasperate the Irish people, they could not have succeeded better. As the Representative of a purely agricultural constituency, I arraign Her Majesty's Ministers to-night of a conspiracy to drive the tenantry of Ireland to revolt, in order to pave the way for coercive measures directed not against the Irish tenantry alone, but against every class of the Irish people. Whether the noble Lord, when he enunciated the policy of the Government last night, intended this I know not; but I tell him that he and the Government which he represents in this House are deliberately embarking upon a course which will as surely exasperate the Irish people as the course pursued by a certain Relative of his, in order to bring about the Union, succeeded in driving their forefathers into open insurrection. It does not deserve the name of a policy; it is a mere pretext for staving off until some distant date the advance of that public opinion which is inevitable in regard to the Irish Question, in order that, in the meanwhile, some scheme may be devised for compensating the landlords for rights which they do not possess. My hon. Friend who addressed the House some time ago (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) described the Government as one of inquiry. I say that it is one of landlord enrichment; and that its so-called policy is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. It is a mockery to the tenantry of Ireland by promising inquiry as to their case, but permitting—nay, encouraging—their extirpation; meanwhile it is a mockery to the nationality of Ireland by deliberately attempting to cheat it out of its birth-right—it is a bribe to the Nationalists, which I say emphatically they spurn and despise; it is a mockery to thousands of English people, who thought that voting in this Government they were simply supporting the Union, and who, although differing as to the means, were ready to support some scheme of self-government for Ireland, but who never contemplated the inauguration of a policy which is destined, if persisted in, to plunge Ireland into bloodshed. Now, Sir, I wish to ask if this was the policy which the people of England, professing Liberal opinions, thought they were voting for when they sent into this House many of the hon. Members sitting on this side who are prepared to maintain the Union? Was that the policy for which the Protestant farmers of South Derry turned out Mr. Healy? Was that the policy for which the electors of South Tyrone voted when they rejected Mr. O'Brien, and put in his place an hon. Gentleman who posed before them as one of the strongest advocates of the interests of the Irish tenants? I cannot help thinking that, on these Benches at any rate, that statement of the noble Lord who leads the Government in this House must be regarded as one of the coldest-hearted policies ever put forth from the Treasury Bench. In almost every sentence there was to be detected a total want of appreciation of the true position of the Irish Question. The noble Lord, speaking of the judicial rents having been fixed for 15 years, spoke of that as a period amply sufficient to make provision for a rise and fall of prices in good and bad years. But have we had any good years since the judicial rents were fixed? If years of plenty had come first, instead of years of scarcity, there might have been some justification for the remarks of the noble Lord. But what has been the fact? I am glad to see the noble Marquess who represents the Rossendale Division of Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) in his place; because he, of all others, ought to be able to explain how it is, if the rents have been fairly fixed, that his father, the Duke of Devonshire, has found it necessary to make a reduction of 20 per cent on a certain portion of his estates. If they were fairly fixed in the past, why has the father of the noble Marquess made a deduction of 20 per cent? He was entitled, according to the doctrine of hon. Gentlemen opposite, to receive the rents in full, or to be fairly compensated for any loss he sustained. The truth is, the tenants are utterly unable to pay the present rents, fixed at a period when nobody could have foreseen the present exceptional and continued depression. Upon one section of the hon. Members who sit on this side of the House rests the gravest responsibility for the position in which we now find ourselves—and that is the Liberal Unionists. The people of Ireland still look to them with a feeling of hope; although they have combined against us in the past, we believe, provided their late professions have been sincere, they may not be indisposed yet to save us from a most threatening and disastrous position. I do not at all envy the noble Lord for the light-heartedness with which he pronounced, last night, a policy of coercion for Ireland. He alluded to the county of Kerry. He is going to send down to that county a General with, I presume, a small army to back him. If Kerry wants exceptional treatment, it is because the landlordism in Kerry has been exceptionally bad. The noble Lord quoted certain crimes and outrages which have been committed in Kerry; but he did not tell the House the number of evictions which have taken place in that county. Although he told us the number of people who are under police protection, he did not tell us the number of derelict farms that for miles and miles may be counted by the roadside within the focus of the "Moonlighting" which the noble Lord proposes to put down, and especially in Castleisland. I do not blame Her Majesty's Government for putting down this "Moonlighting." It has received no encouragement from this side of the House, but has been carried on in defiance of our exhortations. Personally, I have on all occasions denounced outrage; the first speech which I ever delivered in public life—that was but a few years ago—for I am not an old Parliamentary hand and I trust the House will overlook, any imperfections on my part—was in opposition to a nominee of the late Governor of Ireland, Earl Spencer, whom I succeeded in defeating, and on that occasion I denounced crime and outrage in every shape and form. I am prepared, still, to pursue the same course; but I maintain that even could I, and my Colleagues on these Benches, speak with the force of ten thousand voices to the tenantry of Ireland, we could not restrain outrage, if the policy enunciated by the noble Lord from the Treasury Bench last night is to be carried out. If you are to carry out a policy of no consideration for the tenants of Ireland, whose inability to pay their rents is fully admitted in the reduction of 20 per cent which has been made by the Duke of Devonshire, then

Mr. Hooper

I warn you that you will have a Kerry in every county in Ireland; and whatever you may think of it now, you will want a General and an army in each. Are the House and the Government prepared to carry out such a policy as that? The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of the Earl of Kenmare. I should like to show the House what the position of the Earl of Kenmare is. I have no doubt that he is, as the noble Lord described him, an amiable nobleman; but, like many others perhaps equally amiable, he is not master of his own actions. His estate is in no sense his own estate and possession. He is in the hands of certain persons who are known as the Jews of London. His own agent—a gentleman well known to hon. Members on the other side of the House—was obliged to give up the agency of the estate, because he could not get authority from these Jews to make reductions of rent which would enable him “to break the ring,” as he said. I observed articles lately, in some of the Tory papers, advising the Government to seek out here and there some admittedly impoverished tenant for the purpose of his being allowed a rent reduction. Possibly a client employed by the patriotic union—who was to be put up to show that the landlords are not so brutal and exacting as is generally represented. But the Government—and I am not sorry for it—have preferred to present their policy in all its naked brutality. From my own knowledge of the present condition of the people of Ireland, I am able to say that their feelings, at this moment, are only kept under by the hopefulness aroused by the good feeling lately evinced towards them by a large proportion of the people of England, Scotland, and Wales, and that, under the circumstances, exasperation and even bloodshed must result if no concession is made to the just demands of those tenants who find themselves unable to pay their rents. Sir, in conclusion, allow me to call attention to the remark contained in the Queen's Speech, as to the recent vote of the constituencies having been final and irrevocable. We, in Ireland, do not accept that as a true statement of the position. On the contrary, we believe that when the people of England know the real facts of the case they will follow their brethren in Scotland and Wales in determining to do justice to Ireland. Consequently, we do not despair of seeing the united voice of Great Britain in favour of giving the Irish people complete control over their own affairs. If there were nothing else to encourage us in the course we have marked out for ourselves that feeling of hopefulness would alone suffice. But we have other reasons, and we know that if, either through intimidation or in consequence of the bribe which is proposed to be offered to us by the noble Lord and his Colleagues, we were to give up our demands now, there are thousands of our countrymen who would be ready to spring at once into our places. We dare not accept the proffered bribe, even if we were willing, and whatever the consequence may be we are prepared to fight the battle to the bitter end.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): My hon. Friend the Member for the Southern Division of Dublin (Sir Thomas Esmonde) referred to the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer as being a very remarkable speech. Having carefully listened to that speech, and having, since it was reported, perused it carefully in the daily papers, I quite agree with my hon. Friend, and I am not astonished, having regard to the character of that remarkable speech, at the course which the debate has taken this evening. But it is not with the matters that have been referred to by hon. Members representing Irish constituencies, together with the omission of all reference to the Irish Question from Her Majesty's Speech that we, the Irish Members, have alone to deal with. The noble Lord commenced his reference to the Land Question in Ireland with a rebuke to the late Prime Minister. He gave expression to a good deal of regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) should have made any reference to the subject of rents. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, to my mind, and I believe to the mind of every unprejudiced person, only made, after all, what was a most reasonable observation. I will quote the words of the noble Lord as they have been reported in the daily papers. The noble Lord said—

“Then there is that other question to which reference has been made—namely, the payment of rents.”

[Second Night.]

Sir, it does not require half an eye in the head of any man to know that the payment of rents in Ireland at the present time is an absolute impossibility. The House is aware, and painfully aware, of the fact that the prices of all agricultural produce have fallen to an extent which makes it an impossibility to pay the rent upon these holdings as it is at present fixed. I care not whether these rents are preserved by lease or sub-division, or by the tenants having gone into the Land Courts; but what is it that the noble Lord says on the subject? He went on to say—

"Her Majesty's Government are by no means satisfied that there is any serious reason for any one of these allegations."

That, Sir, is certainly a most extraordinary expression of opinion. In the face of what we see, and in the face of facts which are patent and incontrovertible, I repeat, Sir, that that is a very strange and singular statement indeed. But having regard to the nature of the statement of the noble Lord, it is not, perhaps, unnatural that he should have followed it up by a sentence equally extraordinary. The noble Lord said—

"Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to admit that the judicial rents fixed by the Commissioners were at any too high a rate. The Government are further of opinion that it is quite possible the fall in the prices of produce—I allude especially to the fall in the staple article of Irish produce, butter—may be due quite as much to careless or defective manufacture, or to adulteration, as to any general depreciation in prices. Then Her Majesty's Government assume, as I think they are bound to assume, that the Commissioners under the Land Act, in fixing judicial rents for so long a period as 15 years, left ample scope for any exceptional fall in prices. . . . The view the Government take of the present position of the Land Question is, that for all present purposes we take our stand on the Land Act of 1881, which was declared by its authors to be, and accepted by Parliament as, a final settlement of the Land Question. That Act, as supplemented by the Arrears Act of 1882, and as amended by the Land Purchase Act of 1885, Her Majesty's Government regard as a very valid and binding contract, which was made at that time between the State on the one hand and the landlords and tenants of Ireland on the other; and the policy of Her Majesty's Government will be to see that all legal obligations and all legal process arising out of that Act are strictly enforced and perfectly carried out, so far as such action can come within the province of an Executive Government."

That, Sir, illustrates what we have heard, and what is now familiar in our ears about Minnesota and Manitoba, and the remarks of the noble Lord can only produce a painful feeling among the Irish people—a feeling of dread that the alternative rests entirely between destitution and starvation, or the giving up of their homes and emigrating to Minnesota or Manitoba. At the time that a great many of the rents were fixed, the value of agricultural produce was a very fair standpoint to go by. It is a matter pretty familiar to us all now that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), after the Land Act of 1881 was passed, came to the conclusion, after much reflection, and after a good deal of conference with his Colleagues, that to apply that Act properly and to ascertain its value, a number of test cases ought to be selected. The cases which he desired to take as test cases were not those of tenants who were rack-rented, but of tenants whose rents in Ireland stood in pretty fair and favourable contrast to the valuation. But, because the landlords of Ireland believed in their hearts that even these cases would show that the land system as altered by the Land Act of 1881 was unfair, every means and stratagem were resorted to to frustrate the object which the hon. Member for Cork had in view. I need not remind the House of what followed. The hon. Member for Cork was imprisoned, together with other hon. Members of this House; and then the tenant farmers of Ireland, seeing that their Leader, and those whom they looked upon as their guides, were removed from the outside world, and immured in different prisons, swarmed into the Land Courts. I myself was concerned in a number of cases where the tenants made application to have fair rents fixed, and the landlords used every engine and raised every technical point they could to defeat the applications made by the tenants at that time to have fair rents fixed; and, as regards the fixing of those rents, the tenants were cross-examined by counsel employed by the landlords to the fullest possible extent as to what their means were, and what they got for their butter, their corn, and their cattle. It was only after a minute and careful scrutiny into the condition of the tenants, and having regard to the prices and value of produce at the time, that most of the originating notices were filed, and these rents were fixed. Now, Sir, these values are, as has been pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for East Galway (Mr. Harria), fully 50 per cent lower now than they were at the time that fair rents were fixed for the tenants' holdings. The right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister, in what he very reasonably put forward, spoke of the approaching winter season, and compared it relatively with other times. We are rapidly approaching the month of November, which is a very important period in regard to the payment of rents in Ireland, and the circumstances of the harvest form an important element in the ability of the tenants to pay rent. It is not denied that there are good crops in Ireland, but no one can prognosticate the state of the weather; and certainly present appearances enable us to form no sanguine anticipation as to what the result of the harvest will be. That which was favourable and promising a few weeks ago presents a very gloomy aspect now. Much of the crops, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for East Galway, has been dislodged by the heavy rains; and what promised to be fair crops less than three weeks ago, it is believed, will, when garnered, fail to realize the anticipations that were formed of them. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer regards judicial rent as a very sacred thing, and very binding in its character; and because he and Her Majesty's Government so regard them he can extend no hope that the tenant farmers of Ireland, in the event of their being unable to pay these rents, will have anything to expect from their landlords, but that the landlords will act in the ruthless way they have hitherto been in the habit of acting. We have, unfortunately, been made aware of the fact—and any reader of an Irish newspaper must be similarly aware of it—that at the meetings of the Boards of Guardians most lugubrious references have been made to the number of notices of evictions which have been served. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, only last week the Sheriff, with an army of policemen, went to the district of Uweedore, and in that district, where, as has been reported in The Freeman's Journal, 60 evictions had already been executed, he evicted as many as 80 families more. The Sheriff was accompanied by an armed force of officers, sergeants, and constables to the number of nearly 200, and they were employed solely on that occasion in carrying out these evictions. The descriptions given by the Special Correspondent of The Freeman's Journal are sad and painful in the extreme, and I invite the attention of hon. Members opposite to them. They will find the facts there stated most pathetically on account of the simplicity with which they are told; and the recital of those facts may, I trust, lead them to believe that the only way in which the feelings of the people of Ireland can be satisfied is by putting a stop to evictions in the coming winter. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, put forward a few matters, for the purpose, I suppose, of giving the word of promise to the ear. We were told a great deal about Royal Commissions. We have already had experience in Ireland of what these Royal Commissions have achieved. As a general rule, their mission to Ireland has been like that of the army of the King of France—composed of 30,000 men, who “marched up the hill, and then marched down again.” The hon. Member for East Galway pointed out, with a certain amount of facetiousness, the action of one Royal Commission of which he had some experience, which went down to inquire into the condition of the Shannon. The Irish people have very little to expect from the operations of these Commissions for the consideration of Irish affairs. There is to be a big Commission and a little Commission. There is an old story told of a certain sapient Professor, whose chambers were infested with rats and mice. He, therefore, procured a cat and a kitten; and as his chambers were not of sufficient capacity to enable these animals to indulge in their rambling propensities, in order to give them freer access he had a large hole cut for the cat and a small one for the kitten. These two Commissions remind me very much of the action of this sapient and erudite gentleman. I consider that there is just as much common sense in the appointment of the Commissions as there was in the action of this learned philosopher. I trust that Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the very grave and serious condition of matters in Ireland, which is staring the people in the face; having regard to the gloomy and dismal aspect which the coming winter appears likely to open out to them, will see the expediency of acting, not in a partisan spirit, and of consulting the interest of the landlord class only, but that they will consider that property has its duties as well as its rights; that the tenant farmers of Ireland have a right to be protected; and that the evictions now hanging as a sword over their heads shall be suspended, so that they may have confidence that in the coming winter they may not be driven from their homes into misery, the workhouse, or the prison.

MR. T. DONNELL (Tipperary, S.): I cannot congratulate Her Majesty's Government on the manner in which they have conducted the debate throughout the evening. They have allowed what ought to be poured into their ears without attempting a reply. In this respect, indeed, their policy was fairly described by the motto, "J'y suis: J'y reste," for there they have remained stark and silent, and have not endeavoured to repel one of the charges levelled against them, or against their policy, if they have one. The question is, whether they have a policy? They have attempted to propound one; but we consider that it is the very negation of a policy. All they have done has been to postpone the appointment of a Commission after Commission, until, in contemplating the real position of affairs, we can scarce remember where we are, or where we are to begin. There is one Commission which Her Majesty's Government propose to appoint to which I particularly wish to refer to-night, and that is the one which is to proceed to Belfast to inquire into the outrages and disturbances which have recently occurred there. In reference to that Commission the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer said

"But speaking generally about Belfast, I know I am expressing the sentiments of the Chief Secretary and of the entire Government, when I say that we are resolutely determined to restore and to maintain order in Belfast, and to discharge the responsibility which will enable us to attain that end, and to attain it without delay."

Now, Sir, I should like to ask the noble Lord how he is going to reconcile that statement with the speech which he delivered in this House on the Arms (Ireland) Bill, only in the last Session—namely, May 20, 1886. He is reported to have said then—

"Hon. Members in that quarter of the House will please understand that I am not desirous of shirking the question. What I said was, that in circumstances such as they apprehended they would be right in resorting to arms. I maintain, and I defy contradiction, that what I have laid down is the Constitutional doctrine accepted in this country ever since the days of the Revolution of 1688."—(3 Hansard, [305] 1544.)

This was an allusion to the advice which the noble Lord had given to the people of the North of Ireland to rise in arms, to wave their banners, and to charge with all their chivalry. The noble Lord proceeded to quote Lord Althorp. He said—

"In 1833 Lord Althorp—a name which will not be received, I think, with derision by hon. Members opposite—declared that if he had to choose between Repeal of the Union and civil war he would choose civil war."—(Ibid.)

Further on the noble Lord quoted Sir Robert Peel in the same debate, and he said—

"Lord Althorp was a great Whig statesman, who exercised an influence over the House of Commons which has never been equalled by anyone previously or since. Sir Robert Peel, in the same debate, declared that in maintaining the Union the Government might have not only to rely on the scaffold, but to drench the plains of Ireland with blood."—(Ibid.)

I think the noble Lord can scarcely complain of the manner in which his advice in this respect has been taken. He can but be satisfied that, if the plains of Ireland have not been drenched with blood, at least her towns and cities have flowed with the blood of her people. But the noble Lord was not content with quoting English authorities. He went, indeed, to another authority, and he quoted from an essay written by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley, upon Robespierre. He endeavoured to show, by reference to the Dictator of the French Revolution, that the people of the North of Ireland would be justified in taking up arms against the laws promulgated by the Government of this country. Not only did he resort to Constitutional authorities in this country, but he resorted to the doctrines of the French Jacobins in order to justify the attitude he had assumed in Ireland. He asked—

"Will hon. Members in any quarter of the House deny that allegiance is conditional? The allegiance of Ulster is given to this Parliament on condition that it affords to the inhabitants of Ulster protection. ['Hear, hear!' and 'No, no!'] Certainly, that is the condition, and if this Parliament transfers the lives and the liberties of the inhabitants of Ulster to a Body over which this Parliament will have no control, absolutely none, then I hold that no Divine right attaches to such acts of legislation."—(Ibid. 1646.)

These are the words of the noble Lord, and I should like to know what their application is to the present state of Ulster? I should like to know what Reference, what advice, and what Instructions will be given to the Commission that is sent to Belfast? I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he and his Government will advise the Commissioners to investigate the causes of the disturbances that have occurred, and if they are to be brought home to those who have fomented those disturbances? If so, all the water of the River Boyne will be insufficient to clear the noble Lord of the responsibility for those outrages. Then there is to be a second Royal Commission to Ireland. It is not named a Commission, but it is in reality a Royal Commission. A great military Commander is to be sent to Kerry. For what purpose? Is it to put down outrage? We scarcely think that it is. Other Commissions have been sent to Ireland, and yet at a time when every possible murderer in Ireland was supposed to be under lock and key the lives of the officers of the law were being plotted against, and a very few days after the announcement of the appointment of the Commission was made in this House the Phoenix Park murders occurred. Will the noble Lord be more successful in putting down murder and outrage now? Is it likely that General Buller will be able to deal with renewed crime and outrage in Kerry? Is it probable that he will be able to put his hands upon those who may be plotting crime and outrage in Kerry? We, who have had a large experience of the country, know that such has not been the case in the past. It is much more likely that the Forces under the command of General Buller will be employed to collect the rents of that great and good landlord who was referred to in this House the other night—the Earl of Kenmare. That is our experience, and we believe that all the power at the bestowal of General Buller will be exercised to enable the Executive Authority to collect the rack rents of the Earl of Kenmare, and enable the Executive to carry out the policy of the Government which they have enunciated from these Benches—namely, that the rents must be paid, no matter whether they are just or not. That is the second Commission; but there is a third. The third Commission is to be upon trade. We hold that such a Commission, under existing circumstances, can only result in a farce. Any proposition made by the Government will be utterly ineffectual until they are prepared to carry out the policy which was initiated by Lord Carnarvon, or, at any rate, referred to by him, but which was held to be impossible—namely, the protection of Irish trade and manufactures. Irish trade and manufactures were suppressed in the past; and no Commission you can issue and send to Ireland, no Instructions you can give them, will enable them to come back to this country and report to this House that it is necessary to abandon the cherished principles of Free Trade and revert to that policy of Protection which you cast aside years ago. Well, Sir, a fourth Commission is to be issued also. That Commission is to investigate the question of the land; and this, perhaps, is the most significant Commission of the whole. What will this country now think of the present proposals of the Government, whose friends raised such an outcry against Her Majesty's late Advisers for having proposed to buy out the Irish landlords on good security—on the security of the good character of the Irish people, on the security of the Irish land, and the security of a National Government? What will be thought of a Government that now proposes to adopt the principle that they condemned then, and a principle which will not have the security in its favour which was offered by the late Government? What will the people of England, who have been deceived by the representations of the Government, think when they find that the credit of the English nation is to be pledged to purchase out the Irish landlords without having the security of the Irish land, or of the Irish people, or of a National Government? It has been asked this evening, what will the Unionist Party say to that proposal, and what will the Protestants say to the proposals of Her

[Second Night.]

Majesty's Government? I have very lately visited many districts in England where, during the General Election, this subject was thoroughly threshed out and discussed by both sides who were contending for power, and I know the misrepresentations that were put forth broadcast all over the land on that occasion in order to deceive the people of England as to the true issue. I believe that when the scales are taken from their eyes, whenever they are consulted again they will remember the misrepresentations of the past, and place them side by side with the present proposals of Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Advisers also hold out to the Irish people a hope that great public works will be entered upon in Ireland, and that money will be spent in order to assist the people in tiding over their difficulties, in improving the resources of the country, and in bringing their products to the market at a rapid rate. We hold that these objects would have been the proper business of a central Irish Government in Dublin; and it is a business for the development of which we require the aid and assistance of every Irishman in Ireland. That would have been the duty of the National Government, and of the Representatives of Ireland sitting in Dublin, who would not have been hampered by English legislation, and who would have known how to develop the resources of their own country. They would have known the difficulties against which they would have to contend, and they would be more likely to legislate in a right direction than the Parliament of Great Britain, which cannot be said to have the same special knowledge as that which would be possessed by Irishmen sitting in Dublin. Well, Sir, it is well to tell the Government and Parliament that they ought not to deceive themselves as to the issue of this controversy. The Government may hope to stave off the consideration of the Irish Question for a time, in the hope that the Irish people, tired of the struggle, will lay aside their claims. An hon. Member from these Benches to-night told us that the Irish Sea, only a short time ago, looked like a mere silver streak; that the democracies of England and Ireland had joined hands over that silver streak; but I am afraid that the Government are now going to convert it for Ireland, and perhaps for England, into a melancholy ocean. We have, at the present moment, the attention of the Irish people all over the world concentrated on the manner in which this struggle is to proceed. We have the support of our brethren scattered all over the world. We have the support of the English Democracy. We have the support of the able Government who occupied the Treasury Bench a short time ago. We have all these aids at our back now, and are we going to give up the struggle? No, Sir. We shall proceed until it is brought to a final issue, and I believe that will be before long. We have faith that the English Democracy who have taken up this question will not allow it to drop; and certainly the Irish people will never turn their back upon it until it has been carried to a final and successful termination.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Representing, as I do, also an important Irish agricultural constituency, I feel bound to express my strong sense of the disappointment which must have been felt by the people of Ireland when they read the observations of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer in supporting the Address in reply to the Speech of Her Majesty. If we could not have expected that the Government would, after their recent declarations of policy at the polls, have addressed themselves to the question of Home Rule and of local government in Ireland in a large and wide sense, we might have expected that they would have taken into serious consideration the present alarming condition of the tenantry of Ireland. In addition to a feeling of disappointment, there will be a feeling of keen resentment among the Irish people at the almost trivial tones in which the noble Lord spoke of the serious agricultural position of the country. The noble Lord, in the observations which he addressed to the House yesterday, said—

“With regard to the Land Question in Ireland, the Government are aware that various allegations are being put forward with great vigour and great assurance from many quarters as to the condition of the Irish Land Question. We are informed, or we hear it said, that judicial rents under the Land Act were fixed at a great deal too high a rate, even if they had not been fixed too high; and we also hear it alleged that the fall in the price of produce has rendered tenants unable to pay those judicial rents, and we are told that there is now, or will soon be, a general failure to pay rent in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are by no means satisfied that there is any serious reason for any one of these allegations."

Are Her Majesty's Advisers in a position, or would any Government be in a position, to stay a fall in the price of agricultural produce? Are they in a position to regulate the supply and demand which fix the prices on all the various articles of consumption? If they are not, how can the noble Lord support a statement of this character? We traverse every statement he makes. We say that the judicial rents were fixed too high all along the line, and that the various Sub-Commissioners appointed to carry out the Act did not carry it out in the spirit and with the intentions of its framers. I find, from a Return made in 1884, that the average reductions made by the Commissioners were, in Ulster, 20 per cent; in Leinster, 17 per cent; in Connaught, 20 per cent; and in Munster, 18 per cent. And, Sir, at that time, not only the tenants' advocates, but persons interested in agriculture all over the country, remonstrated, and stated that the Land Act was being maladministered to the tenants' wrong. But if the reductions were inadequate in 1884, when prices were comparatively high, how must it have been in 1885, when prices had sunk much lower? I find, from a Return given in connection with 34 places in the county of Kerry, that in August, 1885, the reductions amounted to 15 per cent; and, later still, only a few months ago, in 17 appeal cases at Bantry, the reductions amounted to 14 per cent upon notoriously rack-rented tenants. It is well known that the constitution of the Sub-Courts was objected to at the time by the tenants' advocates and by the Irish Party. That the Land Act of 1881 was not likely to be satisfactory to the Irish Party is proved by the fact that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell and his Colleagues refused to support the second reading of the Bill, because they looked upon it as inadequate to meet the circumstances of the case. That was the case with regard to last year and the present year. Last year the prices fell in a most alarming degree; but this year, notwithstanding the noble Lord's statement to the House last night, it can be proved from various Returns—Market Returns, Returns of Fairs, and Returns from other sources which were easily accessible to Her Majesty's Government—that the fall of prices has not only been serious, but is still continuing, and makes it practically impossible for the tenant farmers of Ireland at the present time to pay their full rents. We often hear a great deal, not alone in this House, but in other places, of the repudiation of contracts. We deny in the most emphatic manner that there exists in Ireland any desire—at any rate, any widespread desire—not to pay rents, but a determination not to pay unjust rents. The judicial rents that were looked upon as unfair and as rack rents in 1884 certainly deserve to be placed in that category now. They have become even impossible rents. There exists in no part of Ireland an indisposition to pay rent; but there is a strong determination not to pay impossible rents, and there is a strong objection to be coerced into the payment of these impossible rents. Will any Member of Her Majesty's Government claim that in 1884 rents were not equally as well paid in Ireland as they were in England? Will any Member of Her Majesty's Government, or any man of acknowledged authority in the country, maintain that the reductions voluntarily given by English landlords have not been larger than the reductions enforced by law under the action of the Land Commission? The noble Lord spoke very flippantly of the fall of prices. He seems to cast a doubt on the fall in prices; and he made a reference to the butter question. Is the noble Lord aware that the fall in the price of butter has been most serious, and that it has been the largest ever since the improvement in the make of Irish butter has been the most marked? Up to 1884 there were complaints as to the make of Irish butter; but within the last three years the make of Irish butter has so greatly improved as to be the subject of widespread and general remark, and to be well known to the trade. But, strange to say, notwithstanding the improvement, the price of Irish butter has fallen, 40, 50, and, in some cases, 60 per cent. Is the noble Lord justified in indulging a sneer at the unskilfulness displayed in the manufacture of Irish butter, and its alleged adulteration? Ought he not to have found the explanation in that which is evident to every unbiassed mind—every mind that does not wish to make out a case altogether apart from the merits of the question? Ought not the noble Lord to recognize fairly and honestly that the fall in the price of Irish butter, and the fall in the price of every other article of Irish produce, is entirely owing to the increased and growing importation of all these articles? Where has the noble Lord sought for his proofs? Has he sought for them in some private museum, or in the agricultural bureau of Dublin Castle, or in the public journals? With the permission of the House I will compare some of the prices, and I think they will prove to demonstration the fact that the fall in prices is so alarming that it is utterly impossible for the tenants to pay the judicial rents that have been fixed. The price in 1882 of three-year-old cattle has fallen from £14 to £10 in the present year, or a reduction of 30 per cent. If the noble Lord or any Member of the Government doubts these facts, let him go to Thom's Almanack, or any other official authority, and he will find the figures I am about to give fully corroborated. The price of two-year-old cattle has fallen from £12 to £7—a reduction of 42 per cent; of yearlings, from £8 to £3, or a reduction of from 60 to 63 per cent; of "weanlings," from £5 to £1 10s., or a reduction of 70 per cent; and the same in regard to sheep in store. In all these items the reductions have averaged from 50 to 55, and even 60 per cent. The noble Lord has referred specifically to butter; and it is strange to say that in the highest qualities, about which there is no question, the average reduction of price from 1882 to the present time is 35 per cent, and in the lower qualities 40 per cent. I need not weary the House by going further into these figures, which all hon. Members can find for themselves; and if they look into those figures, with a serious resolve to ascertain the true state of things, they will discover the actual extent of the agricultural depression which has swept over our country. We refer them to official public documents—to those sources of information upon which their Advisers and officials in Dublin can well be able to lay their hands in a moment. The noble Lord, in the concluding portion of his observations last evening, made reference to another not uninteresting portion of the question when he spoke of the development of the material resources of Ireland. It appears that we are to have a large Commission on the Land Question, and a small Commission of scientifically-minded men to inquire into this question of the material resources of the country. Can it be possible that the Imperial Government of the present day have not sufficient information as to these resources and the means of developing them? Is it possible that enough has not been said during the past half century to enlighten the mind of any Government that is capable of receiving enlightenment? Why, I can venture to say that a small volume recently issued, the work of one of the highest authorities in Ireland, will give Her Majesty's Government, if they are so minded, as much information as any Commission which they can appoint, no matter how long that Commission may investigate—I refer to the work of Professor Sullivan. But we are told that the only way in which the resources of the country can be developed is by the appointment of a Commission—not by acting on the advice of representative men who take an interest in the facts and are prepared to give all their mental powers to the development of the resources of the country in a purely practical way. Sir, we find great fault with the terms of the Queen's Speech, because of its omissions. We find still graver fault with the speech of the noble Lord, because of that which it contains. We tell the noble Lord and we tell Her Majesty's Government that if they seek to aid the landlords of Ireland in a crusade for the recovery of full rent they seek to perform an impossibility; that they will bring sorrow and misery on a land which has already suffered enough; that they will confiscate the tenants' improvements in thousands of cases, and that in seeking to give the landlord more than his rights they will deprive the tenants of all they have. Are they prepared to face that state of things? It will be better for them to take counsel, and follow a nobler and more statesmanlike course than adopt repressive measures, which will be the natural result of their programme.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Labouchere.)—put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

—o—

RIVERS POLLUTION (RIVER LEA).

MOTION FOR RE-APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee of the last Parliament to inquire into and report upon the condition of the River Lea, and to make such recommendations as may appear necessary, be re-appointed."—(Sir Charles Russell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will not press this Motion now. I venture to suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman will find his purpose as well served if he is satisfied with a pledge from the Government that all possible facilities shall be given on the earliest day next Session for the re-appointment of the Committee. It is hardly possible that the Committee could make serious progress with the work before next Session.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I am quite satisfied with the statement of the noble Lord, and ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

TOWN HOLDINGS.

MOTION FOR RE-APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I hope the noble Lord will assent to the re-appointment of the Committee, in which I am interested, with regard to town holdings. The Members of that Committee were selected from all parts of the House, and we sat for about six weeks. Now, I think, if the noble Lord will assent to the Motion I am about to make, the Committee would be able to go to Business in three or four weeks, and, therefore, I hope he will not oppose it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee of last Parliament be re-appointed to inquire into the terms of occupation and the compensation for improvements possessed by the occupiers of town houses and holdings in Great Britain and Ireland; and to inquire into the expediency of giving to leaseholders facilities for the purchase of the fee simple of their property; and also into the question of imposing a direct assessment on the owners of ground rents, and on the owners of increased values imparted to land by building operations, or other improvements."—(Colonel Nolan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): Sir, I very much regret that it is not in my power to meet the views of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I stated, on a former occasion, that, after careful consideration of all the Motions on the Paper, Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that they could make no distinction whatever, and that they would put a Notice of opposition on the Paper with regard to any Motion which should come forward this evening or afterwards during the present Session. This is a general rule from which it is impossible Her Majesty's Government can depart; and, therefore, I cannot for myself, or on the part of my Colleagues, agree to the nomination of the Committee at this period of the year.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I should like to appeal to the noble Lord in this matter. It is all very well to have a rule of the kind he has stated; but I venture to think that this Motion does not stand on the same footing as the Motions for the Second Reading of Bills. The appointment of this Committee is a serious matter; and therefore, having regard to the small amount of progress made, the importance of the subject, and the fact that we shall be able to get to work at an early date, I trust the noble Lord will assent to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

COLONEL NOLAN: I am willing to withdraw my Motion, after the reply of the noble Lord.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE TITHE WAR IN WALES.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD (London): I beg to give Notice that on Thursday next I shall ask the Home Secretary, Whether his attention has been called to an article in The Daily News of the 23rd of August, entitled The Tithe War in Wales?

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I rise to Order, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! As I understand, the right hon. Gentleman is now giving Notice of a Question. According to the Rule of the House made last Session, the right hon. Gentleman must give Notice of the Question to the Clerk at the Table in the usual way.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I beg your pardon, Sir.

QUESTIONS.

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)—DREDGING FOR MUSSELS IN DORNOCH FIRTH.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the conviction of several Lossiemouth fishermen on June 18th, at Tain, for dredging for mussels to be used as bait in the exercise of their calling, such dredging being below low water mark in the Dornoch Firth; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will propose any legislation on the subject and also recommend that the penalties inflicted be remitted?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have ascertained that this case is at present under appeal; and therefore it would be quite improper that any answer should be made to the Question at present.

NAVY—ORDNANCE—THE "COLLINGWOOD" 42-TON GUN.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Committee to whom the question of the failure of the Collingwood 42-ton gun was referred; or whether he can state generally the conclusions of the Committee as to the cause of the failure of that gun?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. Northcote) (Exeter) (who replied) said, the Report had just been received, and would be laid before Parliament as soon as possible.

ARMY—COMMISSIONS IN THE ROYAL ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, To state the numbers of Commissions that have been conferred during 1885 and 1886 in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers over the heads of the gentlemen cadets of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, on gentlemen not required to pass through the Royal Military Academy, with the dates of their Commissions respectively; also to state the cases in which the gentlemen so appointed were or were not required to pass examinations; and, whether they had the advantage of any military training such as is received at the Royal Military Academy?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In 1885 seven direct commissions were conferred in the Royal Artillery, and 11 in the Royal Engineers; in 1886, 20 in the Royal Artillery and 29 in the Royal Engineers. The information asked for by the hon. Member cannot well be given within the limits of an Answer to a Question; but I shall be happy to furnish him with it privately, or it can be given in the form of a Return if he will move for it.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—FISHING BOATS ACTS AMENDMENT—LEGISLATION.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to re-introduce the Merchant Shipping Fishing Boats Acts Amendment Bill which passed through this House last Session?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): In reply to the hon. Member, I can only say that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any legislation of a general character during this Session.

Sir Henry Tyler

ARMY—CHARGES AGAINST THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the grave charges brought against the Ordnance Department by Lieutenant Colonel Hope, V.C., and others, and considering the failures which have occurred in the supply of War Material to the Army and Navy, he proposes to appoint a Royal Commission or a Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry, or what other course he proposes to adopt to satisfy the public mind?

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to institute any judicial inquiry, by means of a Royal Commission or otherwise, into the charges brought by Colonel Hope and others against the Ordnance Department?

MR. F. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the Secretary of State for War, What course the Government intends to take with reference to the charges made against the Ordnance Department by Lieutenant Colonel Hope and others?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, and also in answer to the Questions of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundee, who were kind enough to postpone their Questions until to-day, I have to say that I have carefully considered the charges that have been made; and, so far as I know, none of them have yet taken the form of a specific charge of corruption, of malversation, or of disgraceful conduct on the part of any particular officer or officers; and I have therefore only to invite that which Colonel Hope himself invited in a letter which appeared in The Daily News of Saturday—confidential communications to me of any facts imputing corruption against any individual officer of the Ordnance Department, or in other Departments of the War Office. If any such facts are communicated to me confidentially, I will undertake to consult with the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown; and if those facts constitute, in their judgment and mine, a prima facie case for submission to any tribunal competent to take judicial cognizance of such charges, they shall be submitted to such tribunal; and if no tribunal exists that is competent to take cognizance of such charges I will undertake, on the part of the Government, that a judicial tribunal shall be found to deal with them.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to a petition from the Civil Service Writers, which was presented to the Treasury about twelve months ago, and upon which a Departmental Committee was appointed to report; and, whether he can inform the House when that Report will be made, and when a determination may be arrived at upon a claim which was stated by the last Secretary to the Treasury to be a good one?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY Mr. JACKSON) Leeds, N.: (who replied said, that the Departmental Committee had made such progress in its labours that it expected to be able to make its Report at an early date.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE VOLUNTEERS — THE CAPITATION GRANT.

VISCOUNT WOLMER Hants, Petersfield, asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any decision has yet been come to as to giving an additional capitation grant to the Volunteer Forces?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE Mr. W. H. SMITH) Strand, Westminster : No, Sir; there are still about 20 corps which have not sent in the Return called for by my Predecessor concerning their financial condition.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CONVICTION OF JOHN COX, SIGNALMAN ON THE SOMERSET AND DORSET RAILWAY.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL Glasgow, Bridgeton (for Mr. CHANNING) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Cox, a signalman in the employ of the Somerset and Dorset Railway Company, who was sentenced on the 29th of May last to six months' imprisonment for the results of an error in signalling; whether the Board of Trade has repeatedly insisted on the necessity of the adoption of the train staff system of working single lines, on the ground that it renders such mistakes impossible; whether, at the time of the mistake made by Cox, the Somerset and Dorset Railway Company had failed to adopt the train staff system; whether John Cox has now served nearly half of the sentence passed upon him; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will take into consideration the justice of advising a remission of the remainder of the term of imprisonment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have carefully considered the facts of the case of John Cox, and have to inform the hon. Member that I see no reason to depart from the decision arrived at by my Predecessor in Office—namely, that the case is not one in which he could advise interference. I am informed by the Board of Trade that, although they do not consider the system upon which the line is worked to be satisfactory, yet the accident could never have occurred if the signalman had done his duty. The Judge who tried the case expressed a similar opinion; and, under those circumstances, I must decline to advise any remission of the sentence.

COAL MINES—THE WOODEND COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. BURT (Morpeth) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that the Woodend, or Bedford, Colliery, in which an explosion occurred, whereby thirty-eight lives were lost, was worked with the Davy lamp; whether he is aware that the Davy lamp not only gives a very imperfect light, but has been proved by the experiments of the Royal Commission on Accident in Mines to be utterly unsafe when the ventilating current exceeds six feet per second; whether his attention has been called to a communication sent to the Home Secretary in 1880 by the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Accidents in Mines, in which the following statement was made:—

“The employment of the ordinary Davy lamp, without a shield of metal or glass, in an explosive mixture, when the current exceeds six feet a second, is attended with risk of accident, almost amounting to certainty. The Clanny lamp, when tested in a similar current, has proved to be scarcely, if at all, less dangerous;"

and, whether he can take steps to call the attention of colliery owners to the necessity of providing real safety lamps for the use of their workmen?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS, (Birmingham, E.), in reply, said, that it appeared from the reports of the inquest that the Woodend Colliery was worked generally with the Davy lamp. He was quite aware of the conclusions that had been arrived at by the Royal Commission on Accidents in Mines with regard to the use of Davy lamps, and also of the Correspondence between the Home Secretary in 1880 and the Chairman of that Commission. The hon. Member for Morpeth might, perhaps, be aware that in a Bill which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) introduced last Session for the regulation of coal mines, special and elaborate provisions were made as to the construction of safety lamps used in mines. These or similar provisions he himself also hoped to re-introduce in a Bill which would be brought in at the first opportunity. Meanwhile, the hon. Member would perhaps feel that it would be inexpedient for the Home Office to proscribe the use of any particular lamps of any particular manufacturer, because Parliament might not approve the recommendation, and the expense incurred by colliery owners would be thrown away. The only thing he had power to do, and what he would do in the meantime, was to issue a Circular to colliery owners, drawing their attention to the conditions laid down by the Commission on Mines, with regard to the paramount importance of safety lamps, and also to those portions of the Report which dealt with the relative advantages and disadvantages of the different lamps now in use. Further, he meant to issue instructions to the Inspectors of Mines to insist upon the discontinuance of the lamps now in use in cases where the condition of the workings were such as to render the use of these lamps dangerous. He might add that work at the Woodend Colliery had been resumed with the sanction of the Inspector, and that the Marshall lamp was in use. The present decision of the Home Office was that it was not necessary to attend the inquest by counsel, seeing that the Inspector and his deputy were both present, and were fully competent to elicit all the facts which, in their view, were material.

ARMY—THE CAVAN MILITIA—LIEUTENANT W. H. MALCOLMSON.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, When it is the intention of the authorities to promote Lieutenant W. H. Malcolmson, of the Cavan Militia, to the rank of Captain; and, whether the fact of his having recently married without his commanding officer's consent is any bar to such promotion?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, Lieutenant W. H. Malcolmson was promoted on the 17th instant. His promotion appeared in The Gazette of that day, two days before the Notice of the hon. Member's Question was given.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—MR. C. H. JAMES, LATE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE.

MR. PETER M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, the Report of the Treasury Remembrancer on the accounts of Mr. C. H. James, late Official Assignee of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, and if he will state the cost of the inquiry conducted by the Remembrancer, and out of what fund it was paid; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Report of the Commission or Committee of Inquiry, consisting of the Vice Chancellor, the Right Hon. Judge Flanagan, and a gentleman from the Treasury, appointed about twelve months ago to inquire into the state and working of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The Report referred to in the first part of the Question was not addressed to the Treasury, but to the Bankruptcy Judges. Any Question as to its publication should, therefore, be addressed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. The costs incurred in the inquiry amounted to £477, and it is not yet decided how they are to be provided for.

I understand that there is no objection to the publication of the Report referred to in the second part of the Question.

ARMY—THE CAVAN MILITIA—CAPTAIN SOMERSET MAXWELL.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Captain Somerset Maxwell, of the Cavan Militia, obtained leave of absence from his regiment at the last training; and, whether he was also absent during the training of 1884-5?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, that Captain Somerset Maxwell was absent from part of the training in the year 1884, with leave on a certificate of ill-health, from the whole of the training for 1885, and from part of the training for 1886.

Dr. TANNER: If he was absent on sick leave during portion of the training for 1886, may I ask how it was that he was able to undertake an active political canvas in other parts of the country?

ARMY—THE CAVAN MILITIA—COLONEL DEASE—MAJOR KERR.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the authorities have prolonged Colonel Dease's command of the Cavan Militia for an additional five years; and, why Major Kerr, of the Cavan Militia, after serving upwards of thirty years, is not retired?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, the period of service of Colonel Dease had not been prolonged; but he was eligible for a prolongation of service if the Military Authorities thought right to grant it. They had power to do so in all cases where the officer had not attained 55 years of age.

Dr. TANNER: May I ask if it is customary in connection with Militia appointments?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am hardly able to give an answer to the Question; but if the hon. Member puts the Question down I will endeavour to give him an answer.

Dr. TANNER: I beg to give Notice that on the Estimates I shall put this Question.

FOREIGN OFFICIAL PASSPORT AGENCIES.

Mr. LIONEL COHEN (Paddington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any special reason why Foreign Office passports are not issued at Liverpool; and, if not, whether the Government will consider the propriety of appointing an agency at Liverpool for the issue of Foreign Office passports, in the same way as has been for some time done at Bath, Dover, Yarmouth, Hull, Newcastle, Ramsgate, and other outposts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Passport Agencies at the Outports were instituted at a time when a passport was indispensable to travel on the Continent. Circumstances have now altered, and experience has shown that it is desirable that the issue of passports should be concentrated at the Foreign Office, from which they are easily obtainable by post. There being, therefore, no need for the Agencies, it has been decided to abolish them gradually by not filling the vacancies as they occur. This is the reason why there is no Foreign Office Passport Agency at Liverpool, while there still exist some in the less important towns of Bath, Yarmouth, &c.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—ANGLING IN THE ORNAMENTAL WATERS.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Why the public are prevented from angling in the ornamental waters of the Regent's Park and the other Parks of the Metropolis; and, whether he will rescind the prohibition?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I can assure the hon. Member that it is my wish that Regent's Park and the other Parks of the Metropolis should be made available for the recreation of the public as much as is possible. But there are very great difficulties in the way of allowing angling in these ornamental waters. In the first place, it is obvious that it would be impossible that all the inhabitants of London should be allowed to fish there. And it would be a very invidious and difficult matter to arrange any system of selection of particular individuals. I am informed that the main reason why the prohibition was originally introduced was that it was found by experience that the banks of the waters, and, indeed, all the grass in the neighbourhood, were seriously damaged by people tearing up the ground in search of bait and in other ways; and it was considered that the disfigurement thus caused to the appearance of the Parks was quite out of proportion to the enjoyment of those actually engaged in the sport of angling.

MR. LAWSON inquired whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that the privilege was enjoyed up to the year 1869?

MR. PLUNKET said, that he regretted to say that at the present moment he did not see his way to withdrawing the existing restriction.

REPUBLIC OF ECUADOR—CLAIMS OF THE LAND COMPANY.

MR. J. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been recently taken by Her Majesty's Government to represent the claims of the Ecuador Land Company against the Government of the Republic of Ecuador?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The claims of the Company have been repeatedly pressed by Her Majesty's Minister at Quito on the Ecuadorian Government, who have promised that the matter would be inquired into and considered by the Council of State; but the disturbed state of the country and financial difficulties appear to have prevented any settlement being arrived at. Instructions will be sent to Her Majesty's Minister to report what is being done in the matter, and to endeavour to obtain a settlement.

RUSSIA—ILL-TREATMENT OF AN M.P. AT MOSCOW.

MR. PULESTON (Devonport) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that an honourable Member of this House, now travelling in Russia, was deprived of his passport, and ordered to leave Moscow in twenty-four hours; and, if so, whether any representation can be made to the Russian authorities?

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) said, that finding he was the Member to whom the Question referred, the House would perhaps allow him to make a short personal explanation. At the time he was in Moscow an order was issued by the Russian police that he must quit the city within 24 hours. No question had been asked him as to his religious belief; but he found that the Warsaw police had determined his religious persuasion for him, having stated in a paper attached to his passport that he was a Jew, and could only visit places not forbidden to Jews. That statement as to his faith he had unwittingly carried about with him, as he did not understand a word of Russian, and upon that the Russian police authorities at Moscow acted, although it was stated in his passport that he was a Member of the British House of Commons. A friend of his, to whom he mentioned the matter, assured him that the order would not be enforced; but he, however, left the city as soon as practicable.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No information has reached the Foreign Office on the subject, nor has any hon. Member complained of any ill-treatment in Russia. Without this Her Majesty's Government could hardly make any representation.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER BARROW.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury has yet arrived at any decision with regard to the recommendations of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the drainage of the basin of the Barrow in Ireland?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that the Report to which the hon. Member refers was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant, by whom the Commission was appointed, and no communication on the subject has been received from him at the Treasury.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) inquired whether the Barrow was included in the improvements intended by the Government to be made in the arterial drainage of Ireland, as indicated in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Plunket

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.) said, he specifically mentioned the Shannon, Bann, and Barrow.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR inquired, whether, as the Barrow had just been reported upon by a Royal Commission, it was still the intention of the Government to refer that river again to a Royal Commission?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): The question is, whether the work should be carried out by local resources? That is a very important matter, and has not yet been settled.

Mr. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the proposed drainage of the River Barrow, Whether any new scheme has been laid before Government; and, whether any decision has been arrived at in reference thereto, with a view to carrying it out?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, no definite scheme had been submitted to the Government; but Mr. Stripe, C.E., had forwarded copies of a Circular issued by him to persons interested.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—GWEEDORE, CO. DONEGAL.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state how many evictions have taken place during the present month on the estates of Captain Hill and Mr. Nixon, in the neighbourhood of Gweedore, county Donegal; whether the majority of those evicted had been in the receipt of Poor Law relief during the past six months: how many of the Constabulary were employed on the service: what was the amount of rent due; and, what was the amount obtained under the ejectment proceedings?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I am informed that 16 evictions have taken place on Mr. Nixon's estate, all being re-admitted as caretakers, and 67 on Captain Hill's estate, 31 being re-admitted as caretakers. Many of those evicted have received more or less Poor Law relief within the last six months. Five officers and 170 men of the Constabulary were employed on the service. The total amount due was £290; the amount realized was £4. It is right, however, that I should add that there appears to be another side to this case, and if the House will permit me I will make one or two remarks upon it. I am told that the tenants evicted on Captain Hill's estate owed from three to five years' rent, and a list of sales of tenant right on that estate has been sent me, showing 11 cases in the last three years in which the tenant right of small holdings has been sold at prices varying from 30 to more than 100 years' purchase of the rental. In one case, that of a man named M'Garney, it is stated that he owed £4 for two years' rent up to May 1 last, and though this was not paid, he gave £51 last month to purchase a neighbouring tenant's holding.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman would extend the information, and ascertain whether, as a matter of fact, the rents of these holdings have not been paid, so far as they have been paid, out of the wages of poor servant girls in America, and from the wages of male members of the families going to Scotland and England in search of employment?

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have already endeavoured to make myself acquainted, as far as possible, with all the facts of the case.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ASYLUM—ADMISSION OF SOLDIERS' CHILDREN.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is an established regulation at the Royal Military Asylum that, if a child of a soldier does not, on completion of his term at the Asylum, volunteer for the Army, no other child of the same soldier is to be received; and, if so, when was the regulation made, and by whose authority?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Yes, Sir; the Regulation referred to was made at a Board of the Commissioners of the Royal Military Asylum held at Chelsea on July 31, 1884.

ARMY—THE FORCE IN BURMAH—REINFORCEMENTS.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can inform the House the number of officers, rank, and pay, and the three Forces at present in the Colonies under orders for Budgetary purposes, and the expenditure for the year 1885, as shown in the Estimates, and the amount of the appropriation for the year 1886.

The SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. Chamberlain) answered the question by asking the hon. Member whether he meant to ask whether the three Forces at present in the Colonies were under orders for Budgetary purposes, and the expenditure for the year 1885, as shown in the Estimates, and the amount of the appropriation for the year 1886.

and its cause is said to be an epidemic of sleeping-sickness; and the Administration has pointed out the imperative necessity of attending to the sanitary conditions under which the Natives are living.

As regards the exports and imports, my hon. Friend is correct in stating the falling off in 1885 as compared with 1884 as about £158,000. The Colony has, in recent years, suffered from the fall in the price of sugar, by the arrangements of steam communication, by two years of drought, and by a disastrous hurricane. There is nothing before me to show that "Native policy" can had anything to do with the decrease in population or the falling off in trade.

SOUTH PACIFIC—REPORTED ANNEXATION OF THE FIDJEE ISLANDS.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the SECRETARY OF STATE for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as stated in the newspapers, that Her Majesty's Government have annexed the Fidjee Islands?

The SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. Stansfeld, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : I am glad at the opportunity which the occasion affords my hon. Friend affords of saying that the report which has appeared in the newspapers of the annexation of the Fidjee Islands by Great Britain is a wholly unfounded statement.

WESTMINSTER ASSOCIATION.

MR. S. S. NEWELL (Wigan) asked the SECRETARY OF STATE for Works, What arrangements are being made with reference to the Westminsters Association of Workmen, &c., &c., when opened?

The SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. Stansfeld) : I am sorry to hear that the Westminsters Association of Workmen, &c., &c., is to be opened.

vacancy in the office of Consulting Surveyor, and partly owing to certain technical difficulties which arose in connection with the settlement of the contract.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) inquired when the Hall would be again open to the public, and when the ugly wooden boardings would be taken away?

MR. PLUNKET desired to have Notice of the Question.

ARMY—THE WAR OFFICE—DEFECTIVE MILITARY WEAPONS.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLET (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any, and what, complaints have been received during the last five years by the War Office from General Officers commanding in presence of the enemy as to the quality of the rifles, bayonets, swords, carbines, or their ammunition, as supplied to the Troops under their command; and, whether any, and what, complaints touching these matters have during those five years been made by the Military Departments of the War Office to the Civil Departments of the same Office?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (MR. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said, that such complaints had been received, and steps had since been taken, and were still being taken, to remedy the matters complained of.

NAVY—BREECH-LOADING GUNS.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLET (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What breech-loading guns there are on board ships in commission and afloat at this moment, theoretically capable of perforating eighteen inches of armour (whether steel, steel faced, or wrought iron), at 1,000 yards; and, whether the Captains of the ships carrying these guns have or have not been ordered not to fire them, and for what reasons?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing), in reply, said, that the Colossus was armed with two 12-inch 43-ton guns, capable of piercing 20 inches of armour at 1,000 yards. The Edinburgh and Conqueror had each two guns of similar calibre and power. The Impérieux had four 9-inch 24-ton guns, capable of penetrating at 1,000 yards 18 inches of wrought iron.

The captain of the Colossus had received directions not to practise with the big guns on board that vessel, in consequence of the accident to a similar gun on the Collingwood.

METROPOLIS—TEMPLE BAR.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the First Commissioner of Works, What has become of Temple Bar?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I am afraid I cannot answer this Question. Temple Bar was the property of the Corporation of London, and it was by them removed. What they have done with it I am not aware. I am afraid I can only refer my hon. Friend to the Corporation of London.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON gave Notice that he would call attention to the subject at an early opportunity, and move—

“That the stones of Temple Bar, being historical relics, deserving of preservation, ought at once to be re-edified in some convenient position, as near as possible to the old site.”

IRELAND (SOUTH WEST DISTRICT)—SIR REDVERS BULLER.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is proposed that General Sir Redvers Buller shall act in Kerry under the control of the local civil authorities?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): Sir Redvers Buller will be given civil powers as a Divisional Magistrate. This will give him ample control over the Local Constabulary. The Resident Magistrates will, of course, be directed to aid him in his efforts to detect and prevent crime.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) asked what relation Sir Redvers Buller would hold towards Captain Plunket?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: A new district will be formed. Captain Plunket's and, I believe, Mr. Byrne's district will be curtailed, and the new one formed out of Kerry and Clare, which will be placed under Sir Redvers Buller.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Will he be under the direction of the Inspector General of the Constabulary?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH : No, he will not.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.): Then he will supersede all the officials except the Chief Secretary?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH : No, Sir, he will not.

INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT— GRIEVANCES OF OFFICERS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any and what steps have been taken to remedy the admitted grievances of the officers of the Indian Telegraph Department; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the whole of the Correspondence that has passed on this subject, as well between the Director General of Telegraphs and the Indian Government as between the latter and the Indian Office?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): A scheme relating to the Telegraph Department in India was prepared by the late Secretary of State in Council, and transmitted to India on July 8. The Government of India was authorized to give effect to it, if, after obtaining the views of the Commission which has been appointed to consider the possibility of effecting reductions in the Public Expenditure, they should think it right to do so. Until the decision of the Government of India has been received, it is impossible to undertake to publish the Correspondence.

NAVY—THE ROYAL NAVAL ENGINE- ROOM ARTIFICERS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will favourably consider the prayer of the Royal Naval Engine-room Artificers to have their position improved from Chief Petty Officers to that of Warrant Officers with their privileges, and particularly in reference to their present inadequate accommodation on board Her Majesty's ships, and the unequal amount of their pensions in proportion to their pay and as compared with other classes of Chief Petty Officers?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing), in reply, said, that the position of the Engine Room artificers would receive every consideration from the Board of Admiralty; but no Petition or prayer of the nature alluded to in the Question had as yet been received.

THE BELFAST RIOTS—THE CHARGES AGAINST THE IRISH CON- STABULARY.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, What course the Government intend to take with regard to the arrest and imprisonment, at Belfast, of a sergeant and eight constables of the Irish Constabulary Force, on the Belfast coroner's warrant, on a charge of wilful murder?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The constables referred to in the Question of the hon. Member have been arrested under the Coroner's warrant, over which the Government has no control. Care, however, has been taken that these men shall have the advantage of adequate legal assistance; and it will, of course, be for their legal advisers to say what steps should be taken in their behalf.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether the constables are to be admitted to bail?

MR. HOLMES: Any such application as that must come from the constables themselves; and it is upon that and such matters that their legal advisers will give them the assistance they require.

MR. SEXTON wished to know whether in recent years it had been usual for any one to be arrested in Ireland upon a Coroner's warrant?

MR. HOLMES: Arrests have been made on Coroners' warrants week after week, and, I may almost say, day after day in Ireland.

MR. HEALY (Cork): May I ask if the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware that in the case of the Ballyragget inquest, in which police were similarly returned for trial, the Government of the day did not bring up the verdict into the Queen's Bench for the purpose of having it quashed?

MR. HOLMES: I really cannot answer as to what has been done on former occasions. The object of giving legal assistance to these constables is that they should have the fullest advice, and that all the steps that are necessary should be taken on their behalf. I may say further that, as far as I can understand, that has always been the case when any charges are made against the Constabulary, or proceedings are taken against them.

THE BELFAST RIOTS COMMISSION.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can communicate to the House the names of the Members added to the Commission on the Belfast riots?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): As the Belfast Commission now stands it is composed of an English officer (General Buller) and two barristers of the Irish Bar (Mr. French and Mr. Adams). We think that it should be strengthened by the addition of a police officer of experience and standing, who has had some experience in dealing with a population rather akin to that of Belfast, and therefore we propose to add to the Commission Mr. Wallis MacHardy, Chief Constable of Lanarkshire.

Mr. SEXTON: May I ask on what ground the Government think they are justified in adding to a Commission which they have themselves described as judicial a Scotch constable?

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I do not know that the presence of a Scotchman on the Commission would make it of a less judicial character. My impression is, that considering the nature of the inquiry and the recommendations that the Commission are asked to make with regard to the Police Force of Belfast, the presence of a gentleman who has had such experience as has fallen to the lot of Mr. MacHardy would be very valuable indeed.

RAILWAY CHARGES—THE RETURN.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, When the Return of Railway Charges, ordered 1st February 1886, will be in the hands of Members?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS—Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Returns to the Order referred to by the hon. Member have not yet been received from all the Companies; but a further communication has been addressed by the Board of Trade to the Companies who have failed to give the necessary information, and replies have been received to the effect that the Returns are in preparation, and will shortly be sent in.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS IRELAND— MARYBOROUGH DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

Mr. LALOR (Queen's County, Leix) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it be true, as reported in The Freeman's Journal, that Doctor David Jacob having resigned the position of Visiting Physician to the District Lunatic Asylum at Maryborough, in the Queen's county, in favour of his son, Doctor W. S. Jacob, the Board of Governors have elected the said Doctor W. S. Jacob to that office; whether the Resident Medical Superintendent of the Asylum is a first cousin to the said Doctor W. S. Jacob, and the Government Inspector, Doctor G. W. Hatchell, is his uncle; as he is also the father of the Resident Medical Superintendent of the Asylum, Doctor Joseph Henry Hatchell; and, whether, considering the intimate family connection existing between these several parties, the Government will sanction the appointment of the said Doctor W. S. Jacob as Visiting Physician to the Maryborough District Lunatic Asylum?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH—Bristol, W.), in reply, said, that the office of Visiting Physician became vacant by the resignation of Dr. Jacob, senior. The vacancy was advertized in the usual manner, and the Board of Governors elected Dr. W. S. Jacob. He was not aware of any ground for the suggestion that there was any previous understanding that such an appointment should be made. Dr. Jacob, junior, was not cousin to the Resident Medical Superintendent, nor was the Government Inspector his uncle. Dr. Jacob, senior, who had now resigned, and the Resident Medical Superintendent were connected by marriage. When the new appointment was submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for confirmation, it would be for His Excellency to consider whether there was any reason why he should decline to confirm it.

GOLD AND SILVER HALL-MARKING.

Mr. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade,

Whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake, during the Recess, to consider the question of hall-marking of gold and silver wares, with a view, as soon as the state of public business may permit, to reform the Law of compulsory hall-marking, especially with regard to the watch case trade, as unanimously recommended by the Select Committee on Hall-Marking, 1878-9; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake to ascertain, and report to the House, the exact methods of hall-marking adopted by the Austrian and French Governments respectively, especially as regards the practice known as "the touch," with a view to its adoption, when desirable, in this Country in place of the prevailing uniform practice of "the scrape and parting assay?"

THE SECRETARY (Baron HAYN) (On Wound) Liverpool, East Dialect. With regard to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I am not in a position at the present moment to give him a definite reply. But with respect to the second part of the Question, I shall be happy to communicate with the Foreign Office with the view of obtaining if possible the particulars he is anxious to receive from the Austrian and French Governments, but, from the information at my disposal, I do not think that it would be desirable to alter the present practice of assay.

What extent of AND OF JAMAICA
AND OF DEPORTATIONS BY A OF THE ISLAND OF WAH

MR. JOHN A. HENNESSY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether information has been received at the Colonial Office of certain alleged depredations by a Spanish man of war off the coast of Jamaica by boarding the island, and taking for arms and ammunition, and whether the Government are prepared to take steps to put an end to this gross violation of the law of nations.

THE SECRETARY (Mr. MICHAEL HICKS BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said that the private Notice which the hon. and learned Member had sent of this question had not reached him, and he, therefore, would ask the hon. and learned Member to postpone the question till the morning.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)— ARREST OF THE CROFTERS AT TIREE.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether it is true that the precognition of the witnesses who made declarations with respect to the alleged mobbing and rioting at Tiree which led to the arrest of six crofters disclosed no act of injury or damage to person or property; whether it is true that none of the men arrested were present when the alleged enforcement of the messenger-at-arms took place; and, further, whether it is true that the Procurator-Fiscal is also a member of the firm of Sproat and Cameron, the law agents to the Duke of Argyll?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) (who replied) said: I believe it to be correct that Mr. Sproat, the Procurator Fiscal, is a member of the firm referred to. As regards the rest of the hon. Member's Question, I cannot agree to give any answer, because it is a Question with reference to inquiries which are being made by the Crown with a view to a prosecution, and which are necessarily confidential until the trial takes place.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— EMPLOYMENT AT EVICTIONS.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the duty of the Constabulary to give assistance to sheriffs' officers; and, whether the Chief Secretary has seen the report of the evictions at Woodford?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he had only received Notice of this Question since he came into the House. He had not seen the Report to which it referred. It was the duty of the Constabulary to give every assistance to Sheriffs' officers in the execution of the law. What precise steps were taken in this case he did not know. If the hon. Gentleman wished further information, and would put the Question on the Paper, he would endeavour to answer it.

MR. SHEEHY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

THE NEW POLICE OFFICES.

MR. CAVENDISH-BENTINCK (Whitehaven) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have acquired a site on the Thames Embankment near Westminster Bridge for the purpose of erecting new police offices; and, whether the erection of the buildings there will be under the control of the Department of the First Commissioner of Works?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET (Dublin University): I have heard incidentally that this site has been acquired for the new Police Offices; but the matter is in no way under the control of the Office of Works; it is an affair of the Home Office, to which Department I must refer my right hon. and learned Friend.

MR. CAVENDISH-BENTINCK: I beg to give Notice that on the earliest opportunity I shall move that it is expedient that all public buildings should be placed under the control of one Government Department.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th August.]—[See page 96.]

Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that at present they were in a somewhat curious political situation. They had a Tory Ministry in power without a Tory majority of their own supporters. Upon the Opposition side of the House they had Gentlemen whose policy was not to oppose the Tory Ministry, and the Tory Ministry were dependent for their maintenance in Office on Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House who disagreed with some of their own Party. They were engaged in thanking Her Majesty for Her Gracious Speech. Certainly, considering that the Speech contained absolutely nothing, they were grateful for exceedingly small mercies. It was well known that the Speech was only nominally that of Her Majesty; in reality it was the Speech of the Ministry, and he should, therefore, not be wanting in respect if he said that the Speech seemed to him to be conceived in the spirit of the demand of the footpad—"Give me your purse, and say nothing whatever about it. Don't venture to talk." That wonderful Speech had been very short; but it had been supplemented by the speech of the noble Lord the Leader of the House, who had said that the policy of the Government was a policy of immense deliberation. Well, but the gifted beings who ruled over them had deliberated. They contemplated the appointment of a certain number of Commissions in Ireland; and in the meantime they had sent a Major General there to look after the Irish, and they assured the Irish landlords that if that Major General was not successful in enabling them to obtain their full rents, they would ask the British taxpayer to make up the difference to them. The Dissident Liberals on his side of the House were silent. He did not know whether silence gave consent to the policy of Ministers. All they knew respecting the opinions of those Gentlemen was that they had opposed the Statutory Parliament proposed by the late Prime Minister, and if he were to judge from their Election orations they were as strongly opposed to the Land Purchase scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They appeared to have preferred that the destinies of the country should be in the hands of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, rather than in those of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, because of their disapproval, not only of the Statutory Parliament, but of the Land Purchase Bill of the late Government. Their objections to those plans must have been very strong to lead them to support the Tory Party during the late Elections, and particularly to have supported the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who put forward an Electioneering manifesto, which might be taken, from the noble Lord's position in the Party, to be the manifesto of the Party of which he was now the Head in that House. In that manifesto the noble Lord spoke of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian as having been guilty of a conspiracy more base than any of the designs and plots which he had conceived for the last

[Third Night.]

25 years—referred to the right hon. Gentleman's plans as the outcome of political hysterics and worthy only of Colney Hatch or Bedlam. This "tissue of absurdities," as the noble Lord termed the Prime Minister's Bill, was produced for no other reason than "to gratify the ambition of an old man in a hurry." [Ministerial cheers.] He could understand hon. Members opposite cheering that manifesto, but every Radical must regard it as an insult to the whole Radical Party. He did not believe that manifesto was approved by the Liberal Dissentients. He was surprised that they had not taken the first opportunity of addressing to the public, through their constituencies, a protest against its terms. But who were these Dissentients? According to themselves and their admirers, they were the flower of the Liberal Party. It was said the other day in one of their organs, or one of the organs of the Conservative Party, which he supposed was the same thing, that everyone would admit that they contained nine-tenths of the ability, reputation, and intelligence of the Liberal Party. Now, he had observed the same sort of thing in a great many newspapers; but newspaper editors had an unfortunate habit of making their standard of intelligence in agreement with themselves. It appeared that the great body of the Liberal Party had sinned against the light. They had no business to have opinions. It was their duty to subordinate their views to their political superiors. But he should take the liberty to make a slight comparison between the flower of the Liberal Party and other Gentlemen who also sat on that side of the House. They had on his side the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). Surely the right hon. Gentleman was equal, he would not say for a moment superior—he would not say anything invidious—to the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington). Then there was his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). Perhaps his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) would excuse him for saying that the right hon. Member for Derby was his equal. They all recognized the great ability and intelligence of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James). Still, he thought the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell) was the equal of that right hon. and learned Member. Then there was the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). He would not venture to pit any single individual against a Gentleman of such masterly intelligence; but he did almost think that the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), the late President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella), and the late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) and other Gentlemen who sat on that Bench, were perhaps almost the equal in intelligence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby. The majority of the Dissentients were Whigs. Now, whatever the Whigs might have been once, they were now a small aristocratic body with exceedingly few followers in the country; they had almost all gone over to the Conservative side. They never had a majority in the House. But they always exercised a weight out of all proportion to their numbers in the Liberal Party, because they had always managed in some way to get in large numbers upon the Executive. They might well use the words, Sic vos non vobis. They always got into Office and kept themselves in Office. In this art they were, of course, the superiors of the Radicals. There was nothing in the alliance of the Whigs with the Tories. To the Whigs, politics were nothing but a game between two rival aristocratic bands, with Office as the stakes. They had always been ready to ally themselves with the Tories when they thought the Democratic coach was going too fast. He did not blame them for it; but he protested against the prescriptive right which those Gentlemen seemed to think they had to be the Leaders of the Liberal Party, and against the opinion they seemed to entertain that when they spoke Liberals were to hear and obey. Besides this Whig gang and some other nondescripts here and there, there was what perhaps he might term the Birmingham gang. The Head of the Birmingham gang was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The gang consisted mainly of the family of the right hon. Gentleman and the present and ex-Town Councillors and Aldermen of Birmingham. No doubt, the people of Birmingham owed these Gentlemen gratitude for their municipal services; but at the Elections they appear to have subordinated Imperial interests to municipal gratitude. In the country and beyond Birmingham he thought these Birmingham Gentlemen had no sort of influence, and that was not surprising, for the views of the right hon. Gentleman on Ireland had frequently been before the public, and the right hon. Gentleman had never made a speech on the subject without proposing some new plan and contradicting some previous speech of his own. It seemed to him that the basis of the right hon. Gentleman's policy in regard to Ireland was that no scheme was to be judged on its merits, and that no scheme could possibly be good of which he himself was not the author. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman's policy was to reverse the words of Dickens—"Short's your friend, not Codlin." The Radicals in the country, as soon as they perceived that the right hon. Gentleman desired to establish a Dictatorship for himself in the Radical Party, protested against it; but they were still more indignant when they found the right hon. Gentleman calling in the Tories as allies in order to force that Dictatorship upon them. He wished to point out that no Dissident Liberal who had had to submit to a contest at the Elections had been returned by Liberal votes. There was a majority in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in Scotland and Wales, and in Great Britain 1,300,000 Liberal electors voted in favour of it. The Dissident Liberals were not convinced by the argument of figures, and attributed the votes given in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to a temporary aberration of intelligence on the part of the electors. But there was no doubt that the policy of the Liberal Party must be the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Still these Whig Gentlemen met at Devonshire House. They deposed the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and chose the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale as their Leader, declared themselves to be the Liberal Party, and proceeded to state what were the views of this Party—namely, to keep the Tories in Office until the recalcitrant Liberals accepted their Leaders. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham was at that meeting. Not long ago the right hon. Member for West Birmingham denounced the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale as a Rip van Winkle; and the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale pointed out that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, with his doctrine of ransom, was little better than a bandit. He was very curious to know what concessions on the one side or the other had brought these two hon. Members together. He deplored the fall of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was worthy of better things than to become a mere Whig henchman and to elaborate policies for the Liberal Party in a ducal drawing-room. When the Doge of Genoa visited Louis XIV. at Versailles he was asked what was the most strange thing he had seen at Versailles, and he answered, "Myself." If the right hon. Gentleman had been asked what was the most strange thing he had seen at Devonshire House, and had answered sincerely, he would have said, "Myself." Facilis descensus Aterni; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would pause in his downward career. If not, the next thing that would be heard of would be that the right hon. Gentleman had been gazetted Lord Chamberlain, and the right hon. Gentleman would produce a genealogy—certified to by the Somerset Herald-at-Arms—that he was descended from the Sire de Chamberlain, who came to England with the Sire de Brassey at the time of the Norman Conquest. The Radicals did not for a moment ignore the great qualities of the right hon. Gentleman, and would always be glad to receive him as one of their Leaders; but as a Dictator forced upon them by an illustrious family and Tory votes the Radicals would never accept him. He believed that the majority of the electors were in favour of Home Rule, and that the Land Purchase Bill lost the Election. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian introduced that Bill, not that he particularly approved of it, but to conciliate the Tories. The right hon. Gentleman did not conciliate the Tories, and alienated a considerable number of Radicals. The fact was that Democrats had no sort of sympathy with landlords in this country, and they had still less sympathy with landlords in Ireland. They considered that the distressful state of Ireland was mainly due to the oppression and iniquities of the Irish landlords; and far from wishing to buy them out they were perfectly ready to leave them to the tender mercies of an Irish Parliament. He had no doubt they would receive justice; and no doubt useful precedents would be established for Democrats dealing with landlords in this country. He did not envy the position of Her Majesty's Government. The position of Dissident Liberals in the House was sufficiently humiliating; but not so humiliating as the position of the Government, who were obliged to bow the knee to the Whigs. He looked upon the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a sort of Sinbad, with the Whigs upon his back, and the Whig bridle in his mouth, and he wished him joy of them. At the same time, he (Mr. Labouchere) was anxious to conciliate. He was always in favour of a fatted-calf policy, and if the Dissident Liberals would come back the rest of the Party would be ready to receive them with open arms. But he did not think even the Prodigal Son would have been received with open arms if he had returned to his father with a band of the companions of his debaucheries to knock at his father's door. If he had wished to dislodge his father from his seat at the head of the table, and had told the decent, respectable friends of his father that they were to wait on this prodigal son and his companions, he suspected there would have been very little fatted calf for them. The direct issue at the Elections was the question of Ireland, yet there was no mention of Ireland in Her Majesty's Speech. That was, however, supplemented by the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that House, and of a noble Lord in "another place," and their declaration was that there was to be no Statutory Parliament for Ireland. That was perfectly natural; but when they went on to say that the question was finally settled they went entirely beyond the mark. Did they imagine for one moment that the Irish people would consider the question was finally settled until they had achieved their right to self-government? It was no longer a question between the millions of Great Britain and the population of Ireland, but it was a question between the Radical Democracy and the privileged classes. It was a new and monstrous doctrine to contend that the Liberal Party when defeated on a great question like that of Home Rule should humbly acknowledge the defeat and declare that they would cease to strive for the ends which they held desirable. How many reforms would the Liberal Party have carried if they had allowed themselves to be ruled by a doctrine of that kind? He trusted that the Irish would not abate one jot or tittle of their demands, and that in the prosecution of their object they would adopt every means which was legitimate in the case of a nation wrestling to be free. He honoured them for their dogged resistance. The vilest of slavery was the slavery of race to race. There were Irishmen all over the world, driven out of their country by oppression and misery, and it was a magnificent sight to see them still united with their brethren in Ireland in their tireless effort to obtain self-government for their unhappy island. For centuries they had struggled against servitude, for centuries they had clung to their nationality, and now, when the cup was within reach of their lips, they were asked to abandon their design. It had been said that the Chicago Convention would lead to a split; it had done nothing of the kind, but had resulted in an expression of undiminished confidence in the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). The Irish might well be proud of their Leader, who was conspicuous for energy, ability, tenacity of purpose, and for the possession of the mens æqua in arduis. His contempt for the insults which were heaped upon him by the English Press also compelled admiration. When silent, he was told that he did not dare to speak, and that he was a coward; when he spoke, he was told that he could not be believed, because he was a liar. Sometimes he was even called an assassin; but he could treat all these attacks with contempt, because he had gained the love of his countrymen and the respect of every Englishman whose respect was worth having. It had been said that Jefferson Davis had "made a nation;" but it might with even more truth be said that the hon. Member for Cork had made the Irish nation. It was a curious fact of journalism that the two men most grossly abused were the two men most popular in their respective nations—the hon. Member for Cork and the right

hon. Member for Mid Lothian. Hon. Members opposite called the followers of the hon. Member for Cork a mercenary band, because they were supplied with money from America for Party purposes. That Irishmen abroad should send over money to enable Ireland to achieve what she desired showed their ineradicable love for their country. The sneer came with exceedingly bad grace from representatives of the privileged class. How many Gentlemen sitting opposite, he should like to know, had had their Election expenses paid out of funds subscribed by Dukes and Marquesses? It would appear that while it was a dishonourable thing for a poor Member to receive help from his country, it was an honourable thing for Gentlemen opposite, and perhaps some Dissentients on his own side of the House, to sit as the henchman, sycophants, and followers of some noble Duke or other. The intention of the present Government in regard to Home Rule was perfectly obvious. It was that nothing in the shape of local self-government should be given to Ireland. He knew that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had talked vaguely of some scheme which should apply equally to England, Scotland, and Ireland; but no good could come of any identical scheme for the three countries, because a plan suited to England would not be suited to Scotland, and certainly not to Ireland. Like some of his Predecessors, the noble Lord the Leader of the House had already begun to juggle with the figures relating to agrarian crime. When it served their purpose Ministers declared that there was no agrarian crime, and when the contrary served their purpose better they said that there was a vast amount of it. The noble Lord had said that this kind of crime had increased, and he doubtless hoped that it would increase to a still greater extent. Winter was coming on, evictions were becoming more in number, and the noble Lord was about to commission the military to aid in carrying them out. That was what he called "maintaining order." Was it possible to suppose that when men should see their wives and children driven from their homes there would be no disturbance in Ireland? An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear! An hon. Member opposite said "Hear, hear!" He should despise the Irish if in such circumstances they were to remain passive. Well, these disturbances would serve the Government as an excuse for not granting any kind of Home Rule, and then would come the Salisbury policy--the Hottentot policy--of "20 years' firm government." At the end of that period, if the Irish kissed the rod, they would then perhaps have some small modicum of local self-government given to them. It had been the object of the Tory Party to show that if Home Rule were granted there would be disturbances in many parts of the country, and with that view the noble Lord proceeded to Belfast, and there fanned the flames of religious bigotry, and when his efforts had been crowned with success, and when disturbance did break out, he and his Friends came forward saying--"We have proved our case, for you see the bare idea of Home Rule has been the cause of serious disturbances." He thought, for his own part, from their experience of the noble Lord and his Friends and their manœuvres in regard to Belfast that they were most anxious and would do their best in order that there should be disturbances throughout Ireland. The fact was the Tories--the privileged classes--did not want this Irish Question settled. They were not such fools as to kill the hen that laid the golden eggs. Ireland was the best card in their hands. They knew that there was a strong feeling in the country against the privileged classes and their privileges, and they considered it good policy to divert attention from them by stirring up ill-feeling and race animosity in Ireland. He rejoiced at the declaration of the late Prime Minister that he would never cease to protest till Ireland had a Domestic Legislature. That pronouncement would be a message of peace and goodwill to Ireland. The Unionists and the Conservatives declared they would never consent to the establishment of such a Legislature for Ireland, so that no compromise between them and the Radicals was possible. But if the Liberal Party were true to Ireland, and the Irish were true to them, he had no doubt that the cause would win in the end. The policy of the masses would overthrow the policy of the classes. The noble Lord did not limit himself to a negative policy, but announced that a certain General would be sent to Ireland. No doubt this General was a brave and brilliant soldier, but it was singular that in the exercise of his profession he had been mainly occupied in slaying and crushing the Nationalists of Africa. The late Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) declined to sanction the employment of the military and constabulary in the work of rent collecting, and it was owing to this that Ireland had been comparatively peaceful. He wished to know whether the Military Forces of the Crown were to be employed only in preventing outrages or also in aiding the landlords to collect their rents? If they were to perform the latter duty, it was vain to hope for peace or quiet in Ireland. Then the noble Lord had announced the proposed appointment of various Commissions. It seemed to him that this Government might fairly be described as one of Commissions and omissions. The first Commission was to be one for drainage, &c., to be composed of men well known in engineering and contracting works; so contractors would benefit if nobody else did. But this work ought to be the work of an Irish Parliament. The country had had Commission upon Commission, and the question was whether any real work was now to be done or not? The other Commission was to investigate the operation of the Land Act in Ireland. It had been admitted by all, he thought, with the exception of the noble Lord, that judicial rents were at present and must in the nature of things be too high owing to the fall in the value of produce. The noble Lord stated that the Commissioners in awarding the judicial rents had taken into consideration the possible fall of the value of produce. He never heard that stated before, and no one who was concerned in the forming of the Commission or the Commissioners themselves had any such idea. It should be remembered that there were 530,000 holdings in Ireland that could not possibly bear any rent at all and enable the tenants to live and thrive at the same time. Therefore, the formation of this Commission was nothing more than a dilatory plea, and meant very little. But the Government went further, and stated their views with regard to the Land Act. The noble Lord on the Front Opposition Bench, and the noble Lord on the Ministerial Bench, had laid it down that the judicial rent was a final settlement of the whole question of rent with regard to the landlords. When the rent was reduced, the landlords, as he understood it, were guaranteed that they should not in any way suffer if the tenant was unable to pay the rent. The second proposition of the two noble Lords was that dual ownership in the land was undesirable in Ireland. The noble Lord opposite, on these two propositions, founded what he took to represent the policy of the Government—namely, that the State was bound to indemnify the landlords if they did not receive any rent, or a rent less than that which they had a right to under the award of the Land Commission; and that the State ought to buy out the landlords of Ireland. But it was not only that the State ought to buy out the landlords, but that it ought to buy them out not at the actual commercial price of the land now, but upon the value at which it stood in 1881. Then he should like to know where the money was to come from for all this? He presumed that it was, if possible, to be screwed out of the Irish people; and if it could not be got in that way, it was to be drawn from the English people. In any case, it was obvious that the English would have to give a guarantee for it. In fact, according to the reasoning of the noble Lords, we had already given the Irish landlords a guarantee for the amount of the judicial rent, and if the landlords were bought out we should have to give a guarantee for the payment of £300,000,000. What was this but a Land Purchase scheme? What was the difference between this and the Land Purchase scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian? The only difference was that they were to receive more money than they would get under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. He was glad that the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool had protested against such a scheme. He was glad that the hon. Gentleman and the Irish Convention had stated that the Irish people were not ready to sell their birthright for any such mess of pottage. As far as he could see if they did so they would be called upon to pay for the pottage. If we were mortgagees for the greater part of the land, and we guaranteed the rent to the owners of the rest, was it likely that we should grant the Irish

Home Rule? It would be said that the enormous financial interests which we had in Ireland gave us a right to remain there. They knew very well that this scheme was a simple mode of rendering Home Rule impossible. He should like to know what the Conservatives had to say to such a scheme, and what was the opinion of the Dissentient Liberals with regard to it? Liberal Members knew that their constituencies were placarded with great broadsheets denouncing them because it was said that if they were elected the English taxpayers would have to pay a vast sum of money. The Conservatives and the Unionists in Northampton united to oppose him and his Colleague, and the result of the coalition of the two Parties was that they hired a donkey. This quadruped went about the streets with great placards on his back, stating that if he and his Colleague were elected the unhappy people of Northampton would have to pay their share of £150,000,000, which the late Prime Minister was going to take out of the pockets of the British taxpayers and give to the Irish. It appeared to him that this donkey represented the policy of the Unionists and of the Conservatives. The Dissentient Unionists, more than anyone else, protested against this scheme of Land Purchase, and sided with the Government. He thought that they should make some public announcement at once upon the subject. What had the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to say to it? The right hon. Gentleman distinguished himself by his declaration that the landlords and the privileged classes ought to pay ransom; but it would seem, according to this scheme, that the plan of ransom existed, but that the ransom ought to be paid to the landlords. Was the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the scheme, and did he propose to vote for it when it was brought forward? Both sides of the House had protested against any scheme of Land Purchase, and it was no part or parcel of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian for the settlement of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman asked the constituencies merely to say whether they were in favour of a domestic Legislature for Ireland. If that was the case, and there was a majority in the House and in the constituencies against a Land Purchase Scheme, it would be perfectly monstrous if such a scheme were forced upon the House, and, by arrangements and intrigues, carried through. Before any such scheme was passed there should be an appeal to the country. He quite understood the dislike of hon. Gentlemen opposite to such an appeal. They were eager for an appeal in the last Parliament. But he should like to know whether the country had been consulted upon this Land Purchase Scheme? So far as it had been consulted, it had pronounced against any such scheme; and he submitted that they ought to use every Form of the House in order to insist that before the country was pledged to a scheme involving, perhaps, £300,000,000, it should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I am unwilling to trespass upon the time of the House by taking part in a debate which can have no definite issue, which relates to a policy almost entirely in the future, and the prolongation of which, therefore, seems to me, with all deference to hon. Members, to be hardly a useful adaptation of the time of the House. The policy which my noble Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer so clearly and so fully put before the House the other night has been submitted to such an extraordinary process of what the hon. Gentleman opposite who has just addressed us called generalization on the part of hon. Members on the other side of the House, that I think Her Majesty's Government cannot now, in the caricature which is presented to them, recognize any child of their own. I shall, therefore, endeavour to recall, as shortly as possible, and I hope very plainly, the attention of the House to what our policy really is, and to strip it of the enormous exaggerations and misrepresentations brought upon it by hon. Members opposite. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) always interests and amuses the House; but he will pardon me for saying that in the speeches which he addresses to us I think he sometimes goes a little beyond what he really means. When he charged us, as a Government, with encouraging outrages and promoting disturbances in Ireland, when he told us that we were prepared to turn loose the military upon the tenants at the bidding of the landlords, he made charges for which, if they were true, we should deserve to be impeached. But he made them in such a good-humoured way that I know perfectly well he attached no more real importance to them than he did to his description of the Irish nation as a race in slavery to the English race, or to his frequent references to the privileged classes, whose privilege mainly, it appears to me, consists of being invariably abused by the hon. Gentleman. But, if I may venture to say it, we have had more serious speeches than that of the hon. Member for Northampton, and speeches which appear to me to stand more in need of reply. We had a speech the other evening from the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who spoke, as he always does, with a fervid and native eloquence; but he also seemed to be a little hard on the Government when he described their policy as one of coercion, bankruptcy, and repudiation. He must have had something else in his mind; he must have quoted a sentence that he might have applied to a former Government, who had propounded a very different policy. Our policy is, I will venture to say, a very plain policy; it is, I hope, a sober policy; it is a policy which has for its great object the social and the material welfare of Ireland. Let me add that it is a policy to obtain what I believe is earnestly desired—namely, some rest from that ceaseless political agitation which has disturbed Ireland so long. Well, as part of that policy, we have stated to the House our intention to propose an important inquiry into the development of the material resources of Ireland. [Home Rule laughter.] I do not know why that proposal was met with the ridicule which it evoked. I remember the discussion of Irish affairs in this House for some years past, and up to the present time these very matters which were alluded to by my noble Friend were the matters in respect of which the popular Irish Party were always most earnest in their demand for favourable consideration by the Government and by Parliament. And yet, Sir, we are told, forsooth, by the hon. Member for Liverpool that we are bribing, demoralizing, and cheating the Irish people when we attempt to take what, as I shall afterwards show, is a real and practicable step towards seeing whether that policy can be carried into effect, and whether the material interests of Ireland can be promoted in that way. My noble Friend spoke of our determination to restore and to maintain social order in Ireland, exerting all the forces at our disposal for the purpose, and if those forces fail coming to Parliament for increased powers; and we are told, forsooth, that he has made a great discovery of something new, and it is said that social disorder can never be treated except in concert with the redress of grievances out of which the social disorder springs. I remember when the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) held different opinions from those he expressed the other night, when he denounced the doctrines of the leaders of the Land League as doctrines of treason and assassination, and proposed to take a very active part in proposing to Parliament measures of repression unaccompanied by any measures of a remedial character. The right hon. Gentleman never spoke then of redressing the grievances out of which sprung the disorders which he asked Parliament to give powers to put down. When the right hon. Gentleman not very long ago as Home Secretary had to superintend the restoring of social order in the Isle of Skye, what did he do then? He did not wait for the passing of a Crofters Bill, but he sent down gunboats and Marines to put down the crofters. Oh, no, Sir; this idea that a necessary accompaniment of the restoration of social order is the redress of grievances is a modern discovery.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I announced a Crofters Bill at the same time.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes; but the right hon. Gentleman never went forward with it. It was on an occasion subsequent to that to which I have alluded that the Crofters Bill was announced. What is the grievance to which the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was mainly directed? What, in his opinion, is the great Irish grievance which requires to be redressed? Why, Sir, it is the want of a separate Irish Government and a separate Irish Parliament. Why is not the right hon. Gentleman on this side of the House now to ask the House of Commons to consent to that policy? Because he knows very well, as we all know, in spite of the statements of the hon. Member for Northampton, that the country has distinctly and decisively pronounced against it. Therefore, he was telling us to redress grievances in spite of pledges he knows full well we have made against a separate Irish Parliament and a separate Irish Government, and in spite of the fact, which he knows full well, that it is impossible for a Government possessing the confidence of the present House of Commons to propose any such measures. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman another question on this matter. What has this to do with the restoration of social order in Belfast? Was social order disturbed in Belfast on account of the absence of a separate Irish Government or a separate Irish Parliament? [Mr. BIGGAR: Yes; certainly.] No; my impression is that the main reason for the disturbance of social order in Belfast was those unhappy feelings which were excited in that great town by the proposal of a separate Government. But I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman another thing—Is rioting in Belfast, is "Moonlighting" in Kerry, to be permitted to go on until the constituencies have changed their minds and have returned a House of Commons which will adopt the policy favoured by the right hon. Gentleman? Can the right hon. Gentleman, or the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), tell us anything in the Government, or the law, or the administration of Ireland, which justifies the rioting in Belfast or Moonlighting in Kerry? If they cannot tell us anything of this sort, why does the right hon. Gentleman sneer at our efforts to put these evils down? Why did he sneer at us for retaining the services of an able man like Sir R. Dwyer Buller, and sending him with full power to alter and control the organization of the police with a view to the detection and the repression of crime in Kerry? Why did he sneer at our action in Belfast, say that we were bringing the military in to do police work, and make that kind of accusation against us? Sir, we look upon it as our duty as a Government to maintain order, to enforce the law as we find it, considering carefully at the same time if in any matter the law is wrong or unjust, and deciding as soon as we can, if we find it so, to make proposals to Parliament to alter it. I should almost have supposed that the magnanimity of the right hon. Member for Derby, considering that he has escaped himself from the difficult task of administering the Government of Ireland, considering that by the policy which he and his Colleagues adopted they rendered that task immeasurably more difficult, I should almost have thought his magnanimity would have prompted him, at least, to render some aid in the opening days of our work, in meeting the difficulties before us. But if the right hon. Gentleman could not do that, if he held that the policy indicated in the speech of my noble Friend was radically wrong, I should have thought that the courage displayed in the criticism by which he disposed of it would have led him to move an Amendment to the Address. No, Sir; the right hon. Gentleman does none of these things; what he does is to stab us in the back with misrepresentations of our policy, by charging my noble Friend with inciting landlords to exact full rents and with precipitating evictions, and by quoting an expression of opinion from Sir James Caird which was misunderstood, and which Sir James Caird himself has since publicly stated was misunderstood. The right hon. Gentleman quoted that opinion that economical rent had disappeared for the present from 523,000 holdings in Ireland, as what? As a dangerous suggestion to Irish tenants that they should not fulfil their legal obligations. No, Sir; the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is just this—he will not attack us openly; he stabs us in the back. He chalks "No rent" upon the wall, and then he runs away. Does he wish us to rush into legislation upon this most important and difficult question of the land? If so, I should like to know what he would himself propose? He gave no hint of that in his criticism upon our policy. He did not say he was in favour of a Bill for suspending the eviction of tenants under judicial rents. Oh, no, Sir; he merely gave hints to be taken by those whom they may concern. He could not make such a proposal, because he was one of the authors of the Irish Land Act of 1881; and he knows very well, and those right hon. Gentlemen sitting beside him know very well, that any such proposal would be the death-blow of that system of judicial rents which was the main feature of that Act in relation to Irish tenants. Although the right hon. Gentleman does not suggest any change himself he charges us with delay; he charges us—and the charge has been repeated by a good many Members below the Gangway—with proposing a policy of inquiry merely with the view of postponing any action on our part. Of course, we are told that our object is to keep ourselves in the enjoyments of the sweets of Office. [Opposition cheers.] Well, if hon. Members who knew as much of the sweets of Office and of its anxieties and responsibilities as I do they would not be so ready to make the suggestion. What is this policy of inquiry on which we have resolved? We have to do two things. In the first place we have to carry on the administration of Ireland. I have already referred to the enormous difficulties of that task. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in one of his speeches in the last Parliament, or at the time of the Election, referred to the fact that he believed he had, by the introduction of his schemes, made the government of Ireland impossible in any other way than by the granting of a separate Irish Parliament.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I said no such thing.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have not the words here. I do not mean to say that he had intended to do so, but that the fact of the introduction of the Home Rule schemes had made the government of Ireland impossible. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] At any rate, he will acknowledge that the introduction of his schemes has made the task of the present Government, which is not in favour of those schemes, a very difficult task. We have to devote ourselves, then, in the first place, to the administration of the Irish Government. That is not a light task. In the second place, we have to devote ourselves to the careful consideration of what we can do in decentralizing Irish Government, in introducing a system of local self-government in Ireland framed on a popular basis—framed, as far as we can frame it, to meet the interests of Ireland in that matter, while being within the lines laid down by our own pledges and the desires of our constituents. Well, Sir, that is a pretty severe task for us between the present time and the ordinary meeting of Parliament next year. But that is not the whole of our policy. We are not content with that. We recognize—as I have often said speaking on the other side of the House—to the full that it is impossible that the Irish Land Question can remain in its present condition. I have always said so. The system of practically dual ownership which was established by the Act of 1881 is as impossible as a final satisfactory settlement as the copyhold system, which is not unlike it, has proved in England. We find ourselves face to face with this question. We find it intertwined with other important matters in the social state of Ireland, with the want of other employment in other industries, with the pitiable condition of much of the population on the West Coast. We have all these social matters to consider, and they have to be considered by anyone who would arrive at a proper solution of the question of Irish land. What do we propose? We propose an inquiry—an immediate inquiry—by a Commission, a small working Commission, consisting of men who, in our belief, thoroughly understand the question. [An hon. MEMBER: Who are they?] The names cannot be announced yet, especially at a time of year when some of the hardest workers are absent from the United Kingdom. We propose such an inquiry with certain definite points which my noble Friend stated to the House the other day. It is not a general inquiry into the whole of the Irish Land Question. The points have been carefully defined, and we hope and believe that the scope of the Commission is so narrowed that it will be perfectly possible for them to report in time for us to consider the facts they have ascertained and their recommendations, and decide upon any legislation which it may be our duty to submit in the coming Session of Parliament. What I want to submit is, Can we in any other way give a more practical proof of our desire to deal with this matter than by thoroughly sifting it by impartial persons? What do hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway say?

They say that it is impossible that rents in Ireland can now be paid—that they must have a Bill suspending evictions in the case of tenants under judicial rents. That view was stated in a very exaggerated form by the hon. Member for Liverpool, who told us that our policy was a decree of starvation against hundreds of thousands of Irish tenants who were not able to pay their rents. What I want is to state the real position of this question. Everybody in England, at least in the South of England, knows very well that, thanks to the great fall in the price of articles mainly produced in the South of England, the rents of arable farms have enormously decreased within the last few years. That is probably true of other parts of Great Britain; but the case is different from Ireland, as the article to which I mainly refer is wheat, and no one can say that the price of wheat has any great influence on the general state of agriculture in Ireland. My noble Friend the other night referred to two articles which have fallen largely in price in Ireland. He spoke of butter and stock. The price of these articles is a most material element in Irish agriculture. No doubt, a large and permanent fall in their prices must have a material effect on the power of the tenants to pay their rents. But this is no question of rents agreed to in the ordinary way by agreement between landlord and tenant. In such cases, I believe, the landlords generally throughout Ireland have made large remissions in the past year, and they are likely to do so in the future. My noble Friend was charged with suggesting that the Irish landlords should press their rights to the utmost. He never used a sentence which would bear that construction. The noble Lord and Her Majesty's Government would deprecate as earnestly as anyone any such action on the part of the Irish landlords; and we might do so with some force, for I think we have been reminded that there are Members of the Government who are not content with preaching, but have shown that they know how to practise. In this way there would be no difficulty in Ireland, as there had been none in England, in remedying any difficulty which tenants might find in paying their rents in the coming autumn if landlords and tenants were but free to make their bargains for themselves. But more than that, the Act of 1881 contains a provision which, if I understand it rightly, seems intended to save a tenant in such a position, not being under judicial rent, from any hardship. Under that provision a tenant whom his landlord seeks to evict may appeal to the Court for a stay of the decree of eviction until he can apply to the Land Commission for a judicial rent. The Court has to lay down certain terms upon which the decree can be stayed, and I know no reason why in this matter the Court should not act with perfect fairness as between landlord and tenant. Now, I come to another matter—the question of tenants holding under judicial rents. My noble Friend has already put before the House the position of this question. Under the Act of 1881 Commissioners were appointed, and can it be supposed that these Commissioners, who were considered amply qualified by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, fixed the judicial rents without taking into consideration the fact that the price of produce must necessarily vary? I cannot imagine that any right hon. Gentleman opposite will rise and tell us that the Commissioners were so utterly wanting in their duty as not to take that matter into consideration in fixing rents for a term of 15 years. Is this fall in the price of produce, which is now so great, only a temporary or a permanent fall? What do we find? We find, from instances I have already stated in reply to a Question, that tenants can afford, in spite of the fall in prices, to give enormous sums for the tenant right of land in Ireland. These are matters which surely deserve grave consideration, and specially by those who are responsible for the Land Act of 1881, before they undertake to say that the judicial rents were fixed so unjustly or unfairly that, when a year comes in which prices fall, as they have fallen for a short time, the cry is at once justifiable that those rents should be revised. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government have never, from the beginning of this matter, looked upon the Commissioners who have decided rents as infallible either in their method or in their knowledge of the question. We admit that it is possible that they may have been wrong, and, therefore, we include this matter in the inquiry which we propose. It is not for me to forecast what the result of that inquiry may be on either of the two points affecting the payment of rents specified for inquiry in that Commission. It is not for me, I think, to dwell on those remarkable assertions as to our intention to charge the taxpayers with an enormous sum for the benefit of Irish landlords at the present moment. We wait the result of that inquiry; we wait to see what facts are proved; we wait to see what suggestions are made, in order to form our own opinions on them; and when we make proposals to Parliament for the granting of the £300,000,000 suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton, it will be time enough for him to make the extravagant objections of such a remarkable character which he has raised to-night. Now, I come to the final object of this land inquiry. We believe that this Irish Land Question can only be settled by the substitution of a large peasant proprietary for the present system of dual ownership. We trust that the Commission will be able to recommend some practical changes in the present law which will aid us in arriving earlier at that object. But I hope, Sir, the House will not for a moment suppose that we intend at all to give easier terms by way of advance or by way of repayment for loans from the State to landlords and tenants for the purchase of land than were given in the Act of 1885. That Act is working well. It would be cruel to hold out the slightest hope that it would be altered in that direction. It ought not to be altered, for the terms are as liberal as any Parliament in the world ever gave to promote an object of such importance. I am convinced that if it be the desire of the Irish tenants to become purchasers of their holdings on any terms, those terms, as far as this Act goes, are as favourable as they can be. But, Sir, there are matters in which, as we believe, the operation of that Act may be extended and expedited, especially in the congested districts of Ireland. An instance came before me the other day affecting an estate in the West of Ireland in one of those congested districts. The owner was willing to sell; the tenants were willing to buy. They had agreed on the terms of sale and purchase; but the Land Commissioners who were entrusted with deciding on the fitness of the transaction, owing to the nature of the district, the poverty of the land and of the tenants, felt themselves compelled to hesitate whether they would sanction it, because, as it seemed to them, unless they compelled the owner to deposit in their hands a larger proportion of the purchase money than was named in the Act, they would hardly have sufficient backing for the advance it was desired to obtain. If there be a desire, as I cannot help hoping there may be, on the part of new Local Authorities in districts such as those I have named to facilitate the working of the Act, there are more ways than one in which I can conceive, without any loss to themselves, they might give the greatest assistance, both to individuals and to the State, in expediting and extending its operations. That, therefore, is the scope of that inquiry. I have referred, I think, to all the three heads; but I would say very shortly that the whole chance to my mind of any satisfactory solution of this question, or of the restoration of any real prosperity to Ireland, must depend upon that enforcement of legal obligations without which no country can exist. When fair rents are decided, when fair terms of purchase are settled, the law must be carried out; and if it be not carried out, you cannot have confidence or security, without which it is impossible that Ireland can ever prosper. I now come to the second Commission, in regard to which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) was so sarcastic the other evening. It will be of little use, I think, to turn tenants into owners in those poor congested districts of the West of Ireland unless you can find for them and develop some means of livelihood beyond that which they can scrape out of their little holdings. Is there nothing which hon. Members below the Gangway opposite can view with favourable eyes in our suggestion that the development of the deep-sea fishing industry on the West Coast should be stimulated? I am aware that this matter has been the subject of many Commissions, of much inquiry, of frequent Reports, and also of frequent attempts to deal with it. The last attempt was made in 1883. An Act was passed allocating a sum of £250,000 of the Church Surplus towards the building or the improvement of harbours on the Coasts of Ireland for fishery purposes. I understand that the whole of that fund has now been allocated; but with rare exceptions it has been allocated to harbours which are not large enough for the large boats with which it is essential the deep-sea fishing industry should be prosecuted if it is to be prosecuted at all. I am informed, on good authority, there are as many as four or five places on the West and North Coasts of Ireland where harbours of that sort could be constructed at a comparatively small cost—nothing like the £300,000,000 mentioned by the hon. Member for Northampton—with communication by tramway or railway to existing means of communication with markets, so as to afford means for the development of those deep-sea fisheries which would be so infinitely more productive than any industry which the inhabitants of that Coast at present prosecute. Is there nothing in that view of the problem which commends itself to hon. Members? I do not say that it can be done; but I do say that I should like to see it done. People talk of emigration or migration as the sole remedy of the inhabitants of the West of Ireland. I would, if I could, infinitely prefer to leave them there and enable them to live there. I think hon. Members below the Gangway opposite will be of that opinion too. That, then, is the first head of inquiry for the second Commission. What is the next head? It is the completion of the arterial drainage of Ireland. As the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) reminded the House the other night, much has been done and is being done in existing Acts of Parliament by the Board of Works and by Local Boards in Ireland for the improvement of the drainage of that country; but there are certain great arteries into which all the small drainage works must run which have never been properly cared for, as they ought to be if the small drainage works are to work effectively. And those great works can never—I have given great thought and consideration to the subject—be carried out solely by local enterprise, because they never can pay those locally interested in them. Is not that a question which may, and ought to be, fairly considered? If it were shown to the satisfaction of the House of Commons that a comparatively small sum—£750,000—would really complete this arterial drainage of Ireland—and on which, no doubt, some return would be obtainable for the State—if that could be shown to the satisfaction of the House of Commons, is not that a policy which hon. Members might support in the material interests of their country, and which ought not to be unacceptable to the British Parliament? Then as to the third inquiry. It has been my fate to travel a good deal about Ireland. I appeal to hon. Members from Ireland, and others who know the country, whether they know anything much worse in any part of the world than the "facilities," if I may so call them, for interchange of traffic afforded by the different Railway Companies, and the rates and fares for the conveyance of passengers? At one time it was proposed that all this should be put right by a great system of State purchase of Irish railways. I remember the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) warmly opposed any such proposition. I discussed it in 1874, when I was Irish Secretary, and I cordially concurred with the opposition which the right hon. Gentleman gave to it. But I must say that I can conceive that, if Parliament could in any way facilitate the amalgamation—compel the amalgamation of those little Irish lines, and encourage cheaper fares—an enormous advantage would be gained in the development of the commercial and industrial resources of Ireland. I may be told that this is an inquiry of great scope, and that it relates to matters dealt with by previous Commissions; what, then, is the use of a new Commission? On that point what I say is this—these matters have previously been inquired into mainly by Irish Commissions. They have often reported in favour of considerable expenditure upon them, and of proposals of various kinds; but nothing has been done, so far as I know, to carry out their suggestions. Why has it not been done? Because I am afraid there has been a sort of suspicion on the part of many hon. Members of the Imperial Parliament, that Irishmen would recommend any kind of expenditure, however useless and extravagant, provided the money were only spent in Ireland. What we want to do is to get some Commission which will go into this matter and report upon it with the highest authority to Parliament. My noble Friend informed the House that he proposed that the

Commission should be composed of experts. I should say that three men would be sufficient. They should be men of experience in engineering, in the execution of great public works, in the execution of drainage works, or in agriculture—men especially of large experience of them, not so much in Ireland as in other places. They should come to the examination of this question with all the knowledge which previous Reports of evidence places at their disposal, and with fresh and unbiased minds. They should look at it as hard-headed men of business; they should make their recommendations upon it to us; and if these recommendations should be in favour of an expenditure which to them would be considered practical and useful, why, to my mind, I think it is impossible to exaggerate the value of the backing such a recommendation would give to any Government in urging the acceptance of such proposals. Now, Sir, I hope I have said something to show to the House that what we mean by these Commissions is not delay, but real business. We want to do something in a matter which urgently requires to be dealt with—namely, the Irish Land Question. We want to put an end, if we can, to those interminable series of Reports, coupled with inaction, in those matters so intimately connected with the development of the material and industrial resources of Ireland. And, Sir, may I not hope that on further consideration hon. Members from Ireland will perhaps not view that policy as quite so ridiculous as they appear to regard it now? I quite admit that we are not offering them that which is the main and paramount object of their desire. I quite admit that when we are proposing to decentralize the system of Irish Government, to remodel local government in Ireland on popular lines, we are attempting a work which is not the constituting of a separate Irish Government and a separate Irish Parliament, and we do not make those proposals with the slightest idea—we are not so foolish as to suppose—that such proposals would in any way satisfy their great desire and demand. But what I would, in all deference, ask them to do is to consider these questions a little apart. They cannot have, for the present at any rate, that separate Government and Parliament which they want. Are they not, in the meantime, to do anything for the benefit of their country? What we ask is that the Imperial Parliament should help us in forwarding the national prosperity of Ireland, in doing something to remedy its social grievances. Will the Irish Members not, so far as they can in accordance with their opinions, give us their help in a work which is surely for the benefit of their country? I have detained the House already, I fear, too long. I have been anxious, first, to strip our proposals of that veil of exaggeration which has been thrown over them by so many speakers; and, secondly, to impress upon the House that what we mean is real action, and that it is in no spirit of delay, but, on the contrary, in our desire to do something, that my noble Friend expounded his policy to the House the other evening, and that I am attempting, however feebly, to reproduce and expand it to-night. We shall endeavour to the best of our power to carry out the views we have expressed, and we appeal earnestly for the support of hon. Members, to whatever political Party they may belong, in that labour. So far as we are concerned, we take our stand, in the first place, on the maintenance of the Union. That is the decision which the constituencies of this country have come to. That it is our duty to maintain within the lines of our own pledges, in accordance with the votes we have given and the speeches we have made in this House. But within those lines we will do our best for those great interests that are committed to our charge, in the hope that our tenure of Office may show that we shall leave Ireland in a more peaceful, more prosperous, and more orderly condition than that in which, unfortunately, we now find it.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton said, that, in his opinion, further debate would be useful if it provoked some explanation from the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain). In answer to the appeal that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had no hesitation in charging the responsibility for the blood that had been recently shed in Belfast upon the speeches of the noble Lord the Leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill; for he had led the Orangemen to believe that they had a right to resort to arms. It ill became the present Government to complain that they were unduly charged with inciting to outrage, when the House had the record of those speeches before it. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members who sat in the last Parliament that he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had drawn the attention of the House to one speech of the noble Lord, immediately on its delivery, as being likely to induce ignorant men to resort to such use of rifles and revolvers as might result in loss of life. The noble Lord offered no correction or explanation; and though it might be possibly said that his (Mr. Bradlaugh's) position as a private Member was not sufficient to require an answer, he would remind the House that the right hon. Gentleman the then Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had also gravely emphasized the comment he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had ventured to offer, and the noble Lord had never suggested that his language had been misrepresented or misconstrued. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had described what had been put before the House as a plain policy. That was the only word of description that seemed utterly inapplicable to it. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) wanted, however, to know what the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale had to say about the scheme of local self-government on popular lines in Ireland that had been propounded. The noble Marquess owed it to the country to say whether he had modified his views upon that subject, or whether he was going to support the Conservative Government in what they proposed. Had the views of the noble Marquess as to the functions of the State changed? Or was it the function of the State to do this and that for the people of Ireland which he did not think it the function of the State to do for the people of England? The House had a right to know, also, from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who had done so much to instal the Conservatives in Office, what he thought of some of the proposals of the Government with regard to Ireland? In a verbal sense it was not quite untrue that the country had decisively pronounced against a Statutory Parliament for Ireland; but in a very real sense it was quite untrue, because the great bulk of the constituencies had been acted upon, not so much by the question of the Statutory Parliament for Ireland, as by the proposal to buy out Irish landlords at the expense of the British taxpayer. They had been told that the country had pronounced against the proposals of the late Prime Minister; but that pronouncement had been indistinct, and would not be decisive, because, even in the ranks of the Conservatives themselves, there would be difficulties when the English taxpayers were told that the present Government meant to bribe the Irish landlords at their expense. With regard to the proposal to deal with judicial rents, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them that it was possible that those rents might be found to have been imposed at a higher rate than the condition of the tenant would allow him to pay, but that it was a gross exaggeration to say that the present Government intended to burden the British taxpayer with reference to this. But he (Mr. Bradlaugh) thought that there was a distinct declaration on the part of the present Government that if the Commissioners were found to have blundered in fixing the rent the case was one in which the burden ought not to fall upon the landlord, but upon the State. But what was the State? The State was made up of the taxpayers of the country; and this proposal meant that they were to ask artizans, such as the Cannock Chase miners, who since Christmas had been getting about 16s. a-week, to pay the Irish landlord because a blunder had been made, and on the supposition that the landlord had been given more than he ever ought to have got. Then, what was the reason of the disturbance of social order in Belfast, apart from the reasons which he had previously alluded to? One of the reasons was that the Conservative Party had taught the leaders of the Protestants of Belfast that they would afford them special protection and aid as in the past; and it was that that had led to the disturbance. It was a part of that unfortunate and persistent policy which had always been on the side of the garrison of landlords against the unfortunate Roman Catholic tenantry. With regard to the sending of Sir Redvers Buller to Ireland, if he was simply sent to administer the law, for his own part he (Mr. Bradlaugh) did not think that military Generals were usually found to be profound legists. But if Sir Redvers Buller was going to exercise special powers, then let the Government declare it to Parliament. They heard now that £750,000 would complete the arterial drainage of Ireland. If the Government thought that that money ought to be spent, let them ask Parliament for authority; it would be better even to throw away that sum than to have another winter of crime. But, in his opinion, the Local Authorities in Ireland best knew how to spend the money; it was not the duty of Parliament to deal with these things in this fashion. They were likely in this way only to render the population more helpless; it would be far better to let them have the opportunity of helping themselves. The right hon. Gentleman complained that he had been charged with proposing inquiries solely for the purpose of delay and for the purpose of holding Office. For his own part, he knew that the Office which the right hon. Gentleman held was one which no one would wish to hold except under a strong sense of duty, and he did not make that charge against the right hon. Gentleman; but if it were not somewhat for the purpose of delay, it would have only been necessary to walk into the Library of the House, where all the necessary information was already contained in Blue Books. In the Records now in the Library, taken on sworn evidence before Commissioners, there was already ample information as to the material condition of the people of Ireland as to drainage, and so forth. It was not a real inquiry that was sought; but, under cover of inquiry, the Government wanted to drift off the evil day and to escape from the responsibilities of their position. What was it that the Government proposed? They heard of decentralization; did that mean abolishing the Castle, or was it only a pretty word? Did local self-government on a popular basis only mean that it was to be on a basis popular with hon. Gentlemen who sat behind the Government and supported them with their votes? If the proposal really meant a strong measure of local self-government on a popular basis, then it meant something to which the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale objected, and with regard to which the great bulk of the Conservative Party would have been horrified if they had been compelled to vote for it if brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. As to the condition of the West Coast of Ireland, there were pages and pages of evidence from Irishmen already in existence in Blue Books as to what land should be cultivated, how it should be treated, and with regard to the drainage question as well; and yet now the present Parliament was asked to have a Royal Commission, in order that the Government might be prepared to bring in legislation on the subject? What were the tenants to do in the meanwhile? Were they to go on starving? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told them that the tenant who did not hold under a judicial rent might appeal to a Court for delay until he could appeal to the Land Court. But in the case of a tenant who only paid £2 or £3 of rent the cost of the initial appeal would very likely amount to more than his rent. Everybody knew the state of the matter except the Members of the Conservative Cabinet, and they were going to make an inquiry—an inquiry which would only add another to the many which had ended in nothing. In connection with railways the Government proposed to compel cheaper fares. He was glad of that, because he believed that by railway rates in this country British produce was unfairly handicapped. But what would the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale say to that? At the General Election there was not a word about such a proposal. The Government did not know what their legislation was to be, and so they were to have a number of experts to inquire into the matter. The Government believed that the Land Question could be solved only by the creation of a peasant proprietary, if there was a desire on the part of the new Local Authorities to facilitate it. But who were to be the new Local Authorities? They were merely men in buckram, men of whom the House knew nothing. Were the peasant proprietorships to be created for the benefit of the landlord at the cost of the State? In that case they would have to enact that there should be an Irish peasant proprietary at the expense of England and the working men of England. The true remedy was for Ireland to redress her own grievances in her own Parliament by Members elected by her own people.

Mr. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, that listening to some of the speeches in the debate would convey the impression that one was sitting in the last Parliament, and that Home Rule was still an open question. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to regard that question as still before the country. The policy of Her Majesty's Government, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the first night of the re-assembling of Parliament, and as amplified by the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night, was divided into three heads—social order, the Land Question, and local government. The restoration of social order was clearly the first duty of every Government. It simply meant that every man should be permitted to go about his business when and as he pleased, and that in the fulfilment of any contract into which he might have entered he should not be hindered by the action of others. It was objected to the policy of Her Majesty's Ministers that they did not intimately connect their measures for the restoration of social order with remedial measures. But no remedial measures could possibly take effect until social order was first established. The late Prime Minister did not always object to the restoration of social order by itself, for, speaking at Edinburgh about two years ago, he said that social difficulties or disorder destroyed the peace and comfort of private life and broke up the relations of classes and families, and he took credit to his Lord Lieutenant, Lord Spencer, for having then so far, separately and independently, grappled with the difficulties of social order. The Land Question was, if he might use the expression, complicated by its simplicity. The cultivation of the land was the only employment open to the people of Ireland. Without the land they could not live. The landlords, as a body, were impoverished and were willing to sell. In England, or in any other country except Ireland, the landlords would have a chance of finding rich merchants, professional men, and others, anxious to buy and to develop the resources of the land by the application of capital. The result of the proposals of hon. Members opposite was that the only possible purchasers of Irish land were the present tenants; and by a system of intimidation those tenants were prevented, even when they were willing to purchase on fair terms, from paying their rent in order that the selling value of the land might be forced down to almost nothing. The fact was that the Irish National Party were endeavouring to organize a gigantic "knock-out," by which they might get the land without paying a fair price for it. This attempt was manifestly unjust towards the landowners, and ought to be put a stop to. It was this state of things that the Act of 1881 was passed for the purpose of averting, and in order to secure a greater solidity of the social state in Ireland. An endeavour was now being made to set aside the provisions of that Act on the ground that the depression of agricultural prices was so great that it was impossible for the tenants to pay their rent; but it must not be forgotten that in the last Parliament, when Irish Members wished to obtain an advance of British capital, they maintained that the Irish tenants were well able to pay a fair rent, and pay it regularly, and that, therefore, the security offered for the advance was a good one. In these circumstances the Irish Members could hardly be credited with sincerity when they turned round and contended that the tenants were now unable to pay a reasonable rent. It was the duty of Her Majesty's Government therefore, in the first place, to take such action as would put an end to the system of intimidation which had been organized for the purpose of preventing the payment of rents, and the consequent depreciation in the selling value of the land; and, in the second, to bring together the would-be sellers and the would-be buyers, so that they might conduct their transactions through the agency of the State. It had been objected that any proposal put forward by the Conservative Party having for its object the transfer of the Irish land from the landlords to the tenants must of necessity partake of the characteristics of the second Bill of the late Government. If that were the case it did not lie in the mouths of hon. Members opposite to object to it. The two main objections to the second Bill of the late Government put forward by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) were, first, that it had been offered as a bribe to the landlord to induce them to swallow the principle of Home Rule which they hated; and, secondly, that it proposed to compel the British taxpayer to lend a large sum to what would eventually become a foreign country. Now that both those objections had been removed, there was no good ground for rejecting a fair and reasonable proposal for settling the Irish Land Question.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway Bo.) said, the Government had expressed a desire—and he hoped a sincere desire—to get information with regard to the necessities of the Irish. The noble Lord, so far as he was concerned, did not require any information. He had evidently made up his mind and prejudged the case. One of the most impartial of the Irish Sub-Commissioners had declared he had no intention of considering the agricultural depression, or of allowing it to influence his mind in the slightest degree in fixing judicial rents. If this were a depression of a temporary character, he would say that was a very upright judicial decision; but if the downward tendency of prices continued for nine or ten years, he held that the rents fixed on that principle were unjust and iniquitous to the tenants of Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had intimated that an arbitrary combination had interfered with and hampered the free action of the Land Act of 1881, and that this Royal Commission would have power to inquire how far that action had been hampered by that combination. He was glad it was the intention of the Government to open up this question, as he believed it would fall within the scope of this inquiry to find out how many of the tenants had been examined by the Select Committee of the House of Lords. The statement of the noble Lord attributing the depression to slovenly and careless manufacture would have the effect of injuring the people of Ireland, by depreciating their staple commodities in the eyes of the English consumers. He knew that the tenants of Ireland were all suffering from the agricultural depression; but the most depressed and down-trodden portion of the tenants were the unfortunate leaseholders. The Government had no intention of dealing honestly with the Irish Question if the first act of their official career was not to remove this bar from the leaseholders. He had always found, unfortunately, that the revaluation of the land meant an increase in the rent, and he was sorry to hear the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer express a desire for a revaluation of the land of Ireland. He would prefer a hundred times the Land Act, with all its defects, to a revaluation of the land. He held that the best possible guarantee for the Government was a purchase on fair terms. He considered it was very dishonest for an hon. Member to say that the British taxpayers would be at the risk of losing their money. There was not the slightest danger of that. There was not a road in Ireland but had been made by the efforts of the tenants; there was not a bridge but had been built by the tenants' efforts; and in many cases the railways had been made by their own sole and unaided efforts. He might instance the case of the Derry Central Railway, the interest on the borrowed money for which had been paid by the tenant farmers of the County Derry, owing to the manipulation of the Grand Jury, and the tenants had paid thousands of pounds for the non-existent navigation of the River Bann, which flooded their lands. The only local authority which could properly carry out public works in Ireland was a Central Government properly appointed by the Irish people. He did not attribute the riots in Belfast to the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any other individual. The riots were caused by the excitement and encouragement of the Conservatives, both lay and clerical. There was not a fife and drum band in the North of Ireland that was not wearing a uniform purchased by some Conservative candidate at the last Election; there was not a Member who had the misfortune of belonging to the same semi-political religious association as the hon. Member for South Belfast, but had the gospel of peace upon his lips and murder and outrage in his heart, fostering and encouraging strife. If Home Rule had been passed, outrage and riot would have been impossible in the town of Belfast. Every man in the country would have been a special constable to maintain order. If the outside influences were removed, he was perfectly satisfied the Orangemen would be the extreme Democratic Party of the Irish Parliament, and in the time to come he believed they would be the most ardent Home Rulers in Ireland. He hoped to have the honour to see the hon. Member for South Belfast leading a powerful contingent of Democratic Orangemen in the National Parliament in Dublin. He was not ashamed to belong to a Party that was subsidized by what was termed foreign gold; but he certainly would be ashamed to belong to a Party that would pocket the earnings of the servant girls and labouring men of America in the shape of an unjust rent.

Mr. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) said, they had heard a great deal from the other side of the House about "the verdict of the country," which had been described as "final and irreversible." Well, if they had had as much experience of verdicts as he (Mr. Shirley) had, they would not think so much of them. He (Mr. Shirley) had no respect at all for a verdict. Verdicts were often obtained by the employment of unfair arts and artifices, and by the tricks and dodges of unscrupulous advocates. That was how the verdict had been obtained at the recent General Election. It had been obtained by confusing the issue and muddling the jury. He ventured to say that if the issue had not been confused, and the jury not muddled, the result would have been very different. He did not believe that the electors would have declared against the naked principle of a subordinate Parliament for Ireland. But the scheme had been complicated by the enormous cost which it was said it would cost the British taxpayer. He, for one, had been very plain and distinct on that point. He had not hesitated to tell the electors of the Doncaster Division that he did not approve of the late Prime Minister's plan of buying out the Irish landlords, and that in no event would he vote for such a plan unless he was satisfied that his constituents wished him to do so. He might say that he believed he owed his seat this time to the fact that he had deliberately thrown over all the details and provisions of the late Prime Minister's Bill, and fought the election simply on the principle of a subordinate Parliament. He had even gone so far as to say that he should have no objection to Ulster being entirely excluded from the scheme, if that were found desirable. The principal Conservative newspaper in his district, The Yorkshire Post, had been so struck by the bold manner in which he had fought his election on the principle, and not the details, of the Home Rule Bill, that on the day before his polling it came out with an article charging him with the expression of Liberal Unionist, and not Gladstonian, opinions. They were now told by their opponents that their policy was one of inquiry. That was a transparent device to gain time, inasmuch as the materials for forming a judgment were ready to hand. If he might conclude with a word of advice to his Irish Friends below the Gangway, it was that they should be patient and forbearing at this juncture. He hoped they would not use violent language inside or outside Parliament, but would do their best to prevent outrage and to restrain the passions of their countrymen. Everything depended on their moderation. If they acted in such a spirit, the English people would be with them, and would by-and-bye, if not immediately, give them the Parliament they so much wished for. For himself, he believed firmly that a frank and generous recognition of Irish nationality, with due regard to the integrity, the dignity, and the glory of the British Empire, was the only way of solving the most difficult problem of the day.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. P. McDONALD (Sligo, North) said, the Government had stated that no Business should be taken except that which the Government considered absolutely essential. He considered that, looking at the state of things that existed in Ireland, that was a very extraordinary statement. Were they to wait until February or March in order to set right the riotous state of things that at present existed in Belfast; and were they to wait until then for a remedy for the impending evictions all over Ireland? He considered that the latter question was one that demanded the prompt and immediate attention of the House. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel King - Harman, in moving the Address, very candidly—and

perhaps too candidly for his Party—foreshadowed the policy of the Government. He stated that the Government proposed to exercise a firm and impartial administration of the law, and he also stated that the agrarian question was at the root of the Irish difficulty. He inferred from the double statement that they were to be treated to a dose of the long-promised “manacles or Manitoba.” It was clear, from what had fallen from the speakers on the Government side of the House, that the Government meant to enforce impossible rents; and if that were allowed to continue during the winter it was very hard to imagine what serious results might arise. Hence he contended that it was the duty of the Government to seek measures to prevent the consequences that were likely to arise from the continuance of evictions. If the people gave any physical opposition to the enforcement of these impossible rents, that would be what the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer chiefly desired, for he would then have reason, according to his own view, to come to the House and demand an enlargement of the powers he already possessed. Such a policy was coercion in its fullest import. It seemed to be the settled determination of the Government that whoever suffered in Ireland the landlords should not suffer; for the noble Lord had stated clearly that if the tenants could not pay the rents, the nation—the British public—should pay, and should be called upon to make good the unavoidable shortcomings of the Irish people. He had watched the tabulated Reports of the judicial rents, and had found, especially during the past year, that the rents had been fixed at 50 per cent under the nominal rents. He was, therefore, entitled to say that the Commissioners were now fixing rents on a totally different scale from that on which they fixed them two years ago; and if the Government insisted that the tenants who were paying the higher judicial rents should continue to pay them a great injustice would be done and trouble and danger would result. This, no doubt, was the state of things which the Government desired to bring about; but the Irish people did not wish to give them the chance. Nevertheless, while they were prepared to pay rents that were just, they were equally prepared to resist the payment of rents which they felt they were unable to pay. The price of produce had fallen fully 50 per cent, and in Munster butter which three years ago fetched 1*s.* and 1*s.* 2*d.* per lb. could at the present time be bought for 6*d.* and 7*d.* That was a state of things which was not due to any deterioration in the quality of the article or fault in manufacture, but was due to the extensive and unrestricted importation of butterine into the country. The proposed Commissions were merely pretexts for delay; and such a policy, requiring, as the noble Lord said, “immense deliberation,” was sure to end in failure. As to the Belfast Commission, he asked whether it would inquire into the cause and origin of the riots; it seemed to him that the noble Lord who fomented those riots was the doctor who was now called in to prescribe the remedy. In conclusion, he contended that the only solution of all the difficulties was to allow the people of Ireland to govern themselves.

Mr. JENNINGS (Stockport): Mr. Speaker, no one can have listened carefully to the contributions made to this debate from the opposite side of the House without being struck with one fact above all others. It is that the majority of Members there do not seem to have realized the meaning and force of the decision which the country has recently pronounced. They appear to think that the situation is precisely as it was last June. They even mix up the present Government in some strange way with the last. The last Government came into power by virtue of an understanding with the Leaders of the Nationalist Party, under which they were bound to produce a scheme of Home Rule. The Irish Members seem to think that they have the present Government in the same way under their command; and in that they are, to some extent, supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who argued the other night as if the Government were under a solemn compact to produce some plan modelled on his own. “A fair time ought to be allowed them,” he said; “but that time ought not to be unnecessarily prolonged.” All this, I venture to submit, shows an utter misconception of the present position of affairs.

One of the followers of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) said the other night—"We have been returned with a mandate to demand a National Parliament in Dublin." Exactly; but we here, and a large majority of this House, have been returned with a mandate to oppose that demand—to oppose it, no matter from whom it proceeds, or by what means it may be enforced: 392 Members of this House have been expressly charged to vote against all schemes involving disunion and independent Parliaments. There are only 84 elected to support out-and-out the schemes of the right hon. Gentleman. His regular followers managed to secure their seats—those of them who did so—by assuring their constituents that the twin Bills were dead and buried; that they could never be revived; and that they would never vote for them, even if they were revived. ["Oh, oh!"] Why, Irish Members do not seem to be aware even of that. They do not seem to know that the right hon. Gentleman himself went down to his constituents and declared that the Bills were dead, and this official announcement was received with rapturous applause. The nation intends that these Bills shall remain dead; and not all the skill and adroitness of the right hon. Gentleman will be able to bring them to life again. And now the Irish Members coolly expect the present Government to take up the scheme which has been solemnly condemned by the nation. They ask when the new Ministry will produce its policy. ["Hear, hear!"] Why, it has produced it. It produced it here on Thursday night, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer emphatically stated that the Government meant to maintain the Union, and to restore law and order in Ireland. Again, to-night, the Chief Secretary for Ireland has distinctly repeated that declaration. That is the work which the country looks to them to perform; and we are sent here to support them in doing it. "The question of the hour," said the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on Thursday, "is that of Ireland." But the working men of England are resolved that other questions equally important shall now have their turn; and they object to the whole time of Parliament being given up to Ireland, Session after Session, with this result only—that Ireland is infinitely more disturbed, and more difficult to deal with to-day, than it was when the right hon. Gentleman launched out upon his fatal Irish policy in 1868. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) cast a great deal of ponderous ridicule upon the statement of the Government that it intended to deal with social order as a separate question. He caused it to be understood that he intends to be faithful to his new allies—at any rate, while they can be useful to him. But these very allies he has formerly denounced as the deadliest enemies of social order. In 1882, in introducing the severest Coercion Bill of modern times, he declared that the Party led by the hon. Member for Cork was "a cancerous sore in Ireland"—a sore "which springs from the baneful venom of secret societies and unlawful combinations." "To that foul disease," he went on to say, "it is necessary that the surgeon's knife should be applied. We have to cauterize and extirpate it." It will, of course, be understood that when those words were uttered, the right hon. Gentleman did not foresee that the Party he proposed to extirpate would one day be strong enough to make him Chancellor of the Exchequer. No doubt, he found it much more congenial to his feelings and temperament to hold Office under their patronage than to quake night and day before them, and to live surrounded by a squad of police. But before he succumbed he told this House—on the 9th of March, 1881—that the whole of the agitation carried on by the Land League "was Fenianism under another name; it was aiming at the same end by the same means." Whether that is so or not I do not at present inquire. Circumstances may one day compel this House to look into that question; but what we have at present before us is the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer pledges himself to the statement that Fenianism and the National League are identical in their operations and aims. This connection, no doubt, accounted for the triumphant glee with which he announced on the 3rd of February, 1881, that he had ordered the arrest of a celebrated Fenian, and founder of the National League, Michael Davitt. He was then all for preserving order, "by itself," or in any other way. He flourished his surgeon's knife over the heads of the hon. Member for Cork and his followers in that genial manner which we all admire. He wanted to be operating upon the "cancerous sore" without intermission. We know what produced his change of attitude toward these Gentlemen. It was his deep affection for Ireland. Referring to the repeated concessions made to Irish demands, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer told us the other night that if they had failed it was because we had "mistaken the symptoms." That, he seems to think, is an excellent guarantee for the future success of himself and his Colleagues—that throughout their treatment of the disease they have mistaken the symptoms. Accept their remedies now, and what ground have we for supposing that they will not come forward again, when the "last link" between England and Ireland has been broken, with the cool avowal that they mistook the symptoms? What reparation will it be possible to make then for the disastrous blunder? The symptoms in this case have never varied. They were openly revealed by the hon. Member for Cork in his celebrated Cincinnati speech, the authenticity of which has been proved as much as anything in this world can be. He said—

"None of us, whether we are in America, or in Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England."

Again, on the 5th of December, 1880, he said at Waterford—

"Before a very long time has elapsed, perhaps much sooner than any of us expect now, the people of Ireland will be enabled to enter for the first time on the paths of prosperity and national independence."

So, too, at the Dublin Convention of the Land League in September, 1881, one of the speakers declared that the "Land League had struck down and would ultimately destroy landlordism in Ireland, and with it British rule."

That has been and is the only symptom of the disease which it is important to watch. The recent Fenian and Nationalist Convention at Chicago kept it in the background, but could not keep it out of sight. At the final meeting an ex-Member of this House, Mr. W. O'Brien, said—

"We have told Englishmen candidly that to English rule in Ireland we are, and will for ever remain, irreconcilable."

Mr. Jennings

[Cheers from the Home Rulers.] Ah, but you (the Irish Members) denied that when you were appealing to the country lately. We told the people it was so; but you and the Liberals stoutly contradicted it. Now you endorse Mr. O'Brien's statement. The country will know what to think of that. Now let us go on with this speech of Mr. O'Brien—

"Upon the day when the flag of English domination in Ireland," he said, "is hauled down—then we may be forgiven—the day for holding us to an enforced and detested Union is gone for ever."

[Slight Home Rule cheers.] You do not cheer that so much; you are taking the alarm. Mr. O'Brien is letting out the secrets too fast. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian seems, at one time, to have perceived clearly enough what the truth was, for he declared at Liverpool, on the 27th of October, 1881, that the Party led by the hon. Member for Cork simply aimed at marching "through rapine to disintegration and dismemberment of the Empire." The operations which go on in Ireland or in this country might easily be checked, if it were not for the tremendous vantage-ground possessed by the Party of disunion in the United States. I have once before ventured to warn the House that it is from that quarter they must look for the greatest danger, and assuredly the danger does not diminish. The Irish in America are becoming more proficient every day in the art of combination for political purposes. At one time they acted exclusively with the Democratic Party; but they have seen how much more remunerative a game it is to give their support to the highest bidder. Hence, Messrs. Sullivan and Egan controlled their followers at the last Presidential Election in favour of the Republican candidate (Mr. Blaine), and, apparently, they intend to do the same again. This accounts for the fact that Governor Oglesby, of Illinois, a very influential Republican, attended one of the meetings recently at Chicago, and made a speech. The growing power of the Irish in America may be thought by some to constitute an argument for the adoption of the schemes of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. But what the Irish-Americans want is separation—England turned neck and crop out of Ireland—and they will never be content with less. Everybody who has come into contact with the Leaders of the Irish-Americans knows this to be true. And it would be far better to concede separation, with all its responsibilities and dangers for Ireland, than to go through the farce of setting up a Parliament in Ireland, only to see it used as an instrument to force separation from us afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby stated here, on Friday night, that the "Land League grew from infancy to manhood under a Tory Administration." That is an inaccuracy which one who is supposed to be a great historical authority ought to have avoided. The Land League was born only in 1879, the very last year of Lord Beaconsfield's Administration. It grew to manhood under the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It was also under that Administration that "Boycotting" took its rise. "Boycotting" was never heard of till October, 1880. It was also under a Liberal Administration that the National League grew from infancy to manhood. For all these "cancerous sores" we are indebted to the Liberal Party and Liberal Governments. There are two points which the right hon. Gentleman owes it to the public to clear up. First, did he state the truth in 1881, when he declared that the Land League was doing the work of Fenianism, and was pursuing the same end by the same means? And, secondly, does he hold that opinion now? If he does, his present condition—stewing in a certain kind of juice which I need not particularly specify—is calculated to increase that peculiar reputation which he justly enjoys. That the Nationalists should fail to comprehend the facts which they have now to face is not altogether surprising. It seems to be very difficult at all times for them to discriminate between romance and reality. [Laughter.] Well, I like to prove what I say, and I will give one very striking instance of this congenital incapacity to tell truth from fiction. Take but one instance. They succeeded in persuading themselves last June that they had, at least, 40 or 50 Conservative seats in English boroughs comfortably tucked away in their pockets. Their Leader, the hon. Member for Cork, said to a correspondent of The New York Herald (June 20, 1886)—

"We have the undoubted fact that by the Irish votes in Great Britain which were given at the General Election to the Conservatives we can transfer at least 50 seats now held by the Tories to the Liberal Party. This will make 100 on division, and will convert the majority of 30 against the Bill into a majority of 70 for it."

Of course, the hon. Member did not mean to deceive The New York Herald; he merely fell a victim to that Oriental wealth of imagination which is the birthright of every Irishman. It will be in the recollection of the House that a similar Arabian Nights' tale was related here last Session by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, Mr. T. P. O'Connor. He believed fully in it. What was more serious, he persuaded the Government of the day to believe in it, and it helped to lure them to their ruin. Many hon. Members must remember the great night of the startling revelations about perfidious Tories who had been elected by Irish votes, when the hon. Member came down with a roll of MS. big enough to contain the history of the universe. We remember his thrilling tones, his portentous demeanour; I recall the alarming manner in which he suddenly stretched out a grisly forefinger at me, and beckoned me to follow him. When I refused, he placed the mark of doom upon my forehead, and, with 40 or 50 others, I was ordered for execution at the polls. Sir, I believe we are all, or nearly all, sitting very comfortably before you at this moment, whilst those who opposed us on the lines of the National League are left out in the cold. The hon. Member said last Friday night that his Colleagues, not being opposed in Ireland, "were left free to go and instruct English constituencies in the discharge of their duties at the recent elections." That is quite true; they did so. One of them—and one of the ablest of them, the hon. Member for East Mayo—(Mr. Dillon)—was sent down to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. He pleaded the cause of the National League against me with so much ability that I was sent back here by a much larger majority than before. What proportion of the £65,000 which Mr. Egan, of the Clan-na-Gael and the National League, says has been forwarded to his friends here was forwarded to Stockport I do not know; but it was a very bad investment for the National League. My constituents overthrew the League in their borough, in spite of its boasted 800 or 900 votes, and declared themselves in favour of maintaining unimpaired the Dominions of their Sovereign. They do not belong to the titled class whom the right hon. Gentleman opposite so bitterly denounces, and to whom he has been the means of making more additions than any man alive. They are only working men; but they see through and understand this question far better than those who call themselves great and wise. They have had enough, for the time at any rate, of Irish threats, and of craven surrender to those threats; enough, too, of moonstruck visions of "final settlements," hatched in the over-heated brains of great orators. What they want now is a period of rest from political agitation; they expect to see the claims of Englishmen to justice and fair treatment receive some little consideration. They think that Irishmen practically have a Parliament all to themselves now, and wonder what on earth they can want with another. They ask that something should be done for their declining and menaced industries; that, among other things, the Government should endeavour to open up new markets for our goods in other parts of the world. They ask for—and I believe that their fellow working men everywhere are determined to have—a firm and settled Government, the suppression of lawlessness wherever it may be found, the vindication of the law, and the security to every man of his right to take his labour into any market that he pleases, and to be entirely free in all his relations with his fellow-men. This is what the country requires; and I gather from the firm utterances of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night, and from those of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night, that the Government have made up their minds that the country shall not be disappointed. In that case, I believe they will receive such a measure of support as will enable them to withstand the National League, even though it be reinforced by the Sir Lucius O'Trigger of the Liberal Party.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, that Lancashire was a very large county, and at one time it counted for a great deal in the forward movements in great questions in this country. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings), who preceded him, had said that the working classes of Lancashire were anxious that the House of Commons should address itself to those great questions which concerned the working classes; and then he complained that the House was continually and perpetually engaged in dealing with the Irish Question. But surely the hon. Member could not have been present when the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke the other night, and endorsed what the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said on the question of the hour. He did not see that hon. Gentlemen had much cause to congratulate themselves on in the change of Government; for although there was a change of personnel of the Administration, still the dreary task lay before them of grappling with and settling the Irish Question. It was true that the country, on a first appeal, had decided against the policy of the late Prime Minister; but it was well known that all the reforms which were worth having in the past had not been obtained until after several appeals had been made to the electors of the country. The Liberal Party, therefore, were not in present circumstances discouraged; they were in good heart. What was it that led to the defeat of the late Government? It was assumed that it was simply the question of Home Rule for Ireland. He ventured to say that the Land Question had quite as much to do with the reduction of the Liberal majority at the last Election. It was not the Tory strength that led to the change, but it was those weak, timid, partially-informed men on this side of the House, and the gentlemen in the country who act with them. The change was also largely due to the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) and to the influence exercised also by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). Those were the Gentlemen who had handed over to the Conservative Party for the time the government of the country. He would refer hon. Gentlemen to certain notable characteristics of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill); for in Opposition his proceedings were characterized by the utmost recklessness, causing his Friends to tremble on numberless occasions.

Mr. Jennings

Was there any other Gentleman in the House who could rival the noble Lord in the tone and spirit in which he addressed the people of Belfast? Then the noble Lord issued an address to his constituents, and he thought it was admitted on all hands that the address was unique. There was no other hon. Member who would have followed the style or adopted the strength of language of the noble Lord. The noble Lord had, therefore, the qualification in Opposition of utter recklessness. The noble Lord would probably have to struggle with the Irish difficulty, and he was not at all disposed to quarrel with the Government for asking that they should be allowed till February for the deliberation and consideration of their policy regarding Ireland. It might be inferred from this long delay that the Government did not understand the Irish Question; but when they were in Opposition they seemed to understand every phase of the Irish Question. The Times itself had lately indicated serious misgivings as to the firmness of the views that the noble Lord had lately expressed, and whether he would not be instrumental in giving Home Rule to Ireland. He was himself disposed to think that, after a short experience, a great majority of the people of this country would come to the conclusion that the Government was mainly interested in the welfare of the landlord class in Ireland, and that the great object of their Irish policy would be the emancipation of the landlords from their present difficulties. The landlords were their clients, their favourites, and the victims of their policy would be found to be the Irish tenants. He ventured to predict that if the proposal of the late Government did not find acceptance with the country, any proposal of the present Government, on the lines indicated by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would meet with much less favour at the hands of the Democracy of the country. The Tory Government was for the moment supreme in that House by the assistance of the noble Marquess the Marquess of Hartington; but he ventured to think that the noble Marquess would not be able to carry many of those who had hitherto acted with him if the proposals sketched out by the Government were seriously followed. Between this time and February the people would receive a good deal of enlightenment upon the proposals of the Government, and it would be seen that the object of the Tory Party would be to destroy the work of the late Liberal Administration, and that they were likely to deal with the Irish Question in a way by which Ireland certainly could not benefit. He was pleased to hear the statements of the Irish Members that they would not listen to the Government bribes; but while he was content to wait till February, he hoped there would not then be any dilly-dallying or delay, and that the Government would not screen themselves behind a Commission, but that upon their own responsibility they would bring forward a properly-matured scheme to deal with the Irish Question. He anticipated that the majority of the people of Great Britain, as well as Ireland, would soon adopt the position taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and that his proposal, or something substantially the same as his, would ultimately succeed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): Sir, at an earlier period of the evening the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) interested and amused the House by some observations and speculations as to the position of the Liberal Party, and especially that section of the Liberal Party with which I happen to be particularly connected. I did not hear a great deal which fell from the hon. Gentleman which appeared to call for any very serious notice. But, Sir, as that hon. Gentleman addressed a few questions to me, and to some with whom I have acted, perhaps the House will allow me to make one or two very brief observations upon what he said on that point. It seems to me that the House of Commons is scarcely the place where it is most convenient that the future position and prospects of a political Party, and still less the future position and prospects of a particular section of a political Party, should be discussed. If it is necessary that the prospects of the Liberal Unionists should be discussed any further, I think that discussion might most properly be continued in the pages of those journals where it has already been so ably discussed by the hon. Gentleman. Or, if it is necessary that the discussion should not be confined to newspapers, but should take place vis à vis, it might, perhaps, be more profitably relegated to that meeting of the Liberal Federation which the hon. Member is desirous to hold, and at which the sentence of excommunication upon myself and those with whom I have acted is finally to be passed. I may, however, say that I am not aware by whom any claim has been put forward that we represent any exclusive or disproportionate share of the intelligence of the Liberal Party, or that anyone with authority to speak in the name of myself and those with whom I have acted has ever, in any degree, claimed that we are the sole Representatives of Liberalism, either in this House or in the country. What, I believe, we have claimed, and what we shall continue to claim, is that we have not forfeited our title to Liberalism, and to be considered Members of the Liberal Party, because we have been unable to accept opinions on the question of Ireland and the government of Ireland which were certainly somewhat suddenly and somewhat unexpectedly brought before the House and country—opinions which never, up to a very short time ago, had been held by any considerable section of the Party to which I belong. The hon. Member, I am sorry to say, has been most imperfectly informed of the proceedings which took place at a certain meeting, to which, unfortunately, I did not feel myself in a position to invite the hon. Gentleman. I do not know from what source the hon. Gentleman has found that at that meeting any pretension was put forward to depose my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) from the Leadership of the Liberal Party, or that any rival Leader of that Party was set up. The conclusion at which, so far as my memory serves me, that meeting arrived was one which appears, to a great extent, to be identical to that which the hon. Member himself has formed. It was that so long as, unhappily, these differences of opinion on the question of Irish Government prevail among us, no speedy prospect of a re-union of the Liberal Party could be foreseen. We do not expect—we never have had the presumption to put forward any expectation—that either my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, or the hon. Member for

Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), or those who agree with him, should abandon any of the opinions or doctrines which they have recently embraced. But, at the same time, we are not prepared to sacrifice the convictions which, after considerable thought and deliberation, we, also, have formed; and we cannot subscribe to what appears to be the opinion of the hon. Member for Northampton, that, in view of the paramount object of the re-union and reconstitution of the Liberal Party, we are to abandon, as of minor importance, convictions on the subject of Ireland and the government of Ireland which we hold to be the most important subject with which any Member of the House of Commons can be called upon to deal. The hon. Member appears to imagine that the question ought to be decided for us by the fact that the proposals of the late Government have been adopted at the late Election by a majority of the Liberal Party. Sir, I cannot conceive upon what ground such a contention can be supported. Our political future, I admit, depends upon the opinion of the constituencies of this country, and amongst the constituencies of the country our political future depends, no doubt, to a very great extent, upon the opinions which may be formed, and which may be held, by the Liberal portion of those constituencies. But whatever may be the opinions formed by those constituencies, or by the Liberal portion of them, I cannot imagine or conceive that the fact that a majority of the Liberal Party in this country have embraced certain opinions, and are prepared to support certain measures, is in any way to influence the conviction which we have conscientiously formed, and which, as I have already said, we consider to be a conviction upon the most important subject which we can be called upon to discuss. Before leaving the observations of the hon. Member for Northampton, allow me to say that never, so far as I am aware, has there escaped, either from my lips or from those of any of my Friends, one word of disrespect, or one word that could be construed into a disrespectful observation, in regard to the conduct of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. It would have been very far from the desire of any one of us to have imputed to my right hon. Friend that which was imputed to him by the hon. Member for Northampton this evening—namely, the imputation that he had proposed in this House, and had advocated in the country, a measure—the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill—not because he was convinced of its expediency, but that he had brought it forward and supported it simply as a bribe, in order to secure the support of the Tory landlords. Now, Sir, I understand that before the debate on the Address to Her Majesty is concluded there is a prospect that some definite issues will be submitted to the House. I do not desire, in the prospect of such definite issues being submitted to the House, to go at any length into the general discussion which has taken place; and, above all, it is not my desire to import into this debate anything which is likely to raise a fresh subject of debate, or unnecessarily to prolong it. It has not been denied that Her Majesty's Government, both in this House and in the other House, have not been slow to respond to the invitation which was addressed to them by the Leader of the Opposition, to make as full, as early, and as complete an exposition as possible of their views upon Irish policy. It has been acknowledged by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) that this exposition has been full, and that it has been definite. It consisted mainly of two parts. The Government have announced certain measures which they intend at once to take, and they have also given expression to certain opinions with reference to legislative projects which may hereafter be brought before Parliament. It is the former part of this exposition of the policy of the Government which, I think, the House will be most anxious at present to discuss, and to which it will be disposed almost entirely to confine itself. Certainly, the House cannot be expected to commit itself—and the Government would not, I think, wish the House to commit itself—to any expression whatever with regard to the principles which have been stated in reference to legislation, or legislative projects which have not yet been brought before it. These may be matters of great interest; but they are evidently subjects with which the House is not in a position at present to deal; and there is no opinion which could now be expressed, either on this side of the House or upon the other, which could in the slightest degree commit the House, or, in my opinion, greatly tend to promote a decision upon legislative projects which are not to be introduced for a very considerable period. And now as to the actual measures which the Government propose to take at present. What are the measures they are going to take? They appear to consist of the following measures:—The Government do not ask to be invested with any new or any exceptional powers; they intend to exert to the utmost the existing powers which the law has already conferred upon them; and to employ to the utmost extent the existing agencies for the maintenance of order and the security of life and property in Ireland. With that object they intend to see whether it is not possible to organize those existing agencies in a manner more efficient than that which at present exists. With that object I understand that they intend to appoint a Gentleman to the supreme civil and military control in certain districts which happen at this moment to be more disturbed than the rest of the country. They intend to place in his hands the responsible duty of at once re-organizing the agencies which they have at their disposal, and to make him responsible for the efficient exercise of the power of the law, and of all those powerful agencies. Sir, they have also announced that, if they find these measures insufficient for the maintenance of public order, they will not scruple to come to Parliament at the first moment and ask Parliament to give them such additional powers as they may think necessary. In addition, they have announced their intention of causing inquiry to be instituted into certain classes of subjects which, in their opinion, and in the opinion of many of us on this side of the House, are more closely connected with the root of the Irish difficulty than even the desire for greater self-government, or national independence, to the existence of which the Irish difficulty is attributed by the majority of those who sit on these Benches. Now, Sir, I am not aware that any of those measures which the Government propose at once to take are going to be challenged from any quarter of the House. I do not know whether the Amendments which may be moved by hon. Gentlemen who represent Irish constituencies will challenge any of those measures. So far as I have gathered from the speeches delivered in this part of the House, it is not the intention of any of my hon. Friends who sit on this Bench themselves to take exception to any of the actual measures proposed by the Government. But, although they are not directly challenged, they have been ridiculed and disparaged by the criticisms which have been made upon them. Sir, they have been ridiculed and they have been disparaged by Irish Members, and especially by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). They have been very fairly disparaged by that hon. Member from his point of view; because I conceive it is perfectly natural for him, and for those who agree with him in his opinion and in his object, not to desire the restoration—the complete restoration—of social order in Ireland until—[Interruption by the Home Rule Members, and cries of "Oh!" "Shame!" and "Withdraw!"] Before I am asked to withdraw, perhaps hon. Members will allow me to conclude the sentence. I say it is not unnatural to suppose that those hon. Gentlemen do not desire to see the complete restoration of social order in Ireland until those political objects have been accomplished upon which their hearts are set, and upon which they think the future and permanent prosperity and happiness of Ireland depend, and in favour of which the existing state of social order has undoubtedly, up to the present time, constituted one of the chief arguments which have been used by hon. Members sitting on this side of the House. We cannot expect that the hon. Member, and those who agree with him, should desire that rents—even fair rents—should be punctually and peacefully paid, because the hon. Member and his Friends have never accepted the Land Act of 1881, or the Amending Acts which followed, as a complete or final, or even as a satisfactory solution of the Irish Land Question; and we cannot expect them to desire that even fair rents should be peacefully and punctually paid until changes have been made which will have the effect and result of placing Irish occupiers in possession of their holdings on terms very different from those which were contemplated by the Acts of 1881 and of succeeding years, or even the terms contemplated and proposed by the Land Purchase Bill of the present year, introduced by the late Government. That, I say, is perfectly natural, and I do not see why anyone should complain that the measures of the Government should be disparaged by the hon. Member and those who agree with him. But they have also been ridiculed and disparaged by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby; and I think the House will require some further explanation than it has yet received of the grounds upon which my right hon. Friend has covered those measures with so much contempt and ridicule. My right hon. Friend, within a very short period, has occupied the position of Secretary of State, in which he was, perhaps, more than most of his Colleagues, responsible for social order in Ireland, as well as in the United Kingdom. My right hon. Friend was also one of the authors of the Land Act of 1881, and he was also one of the authors of the Land Purchase Bill of 1886; and I do not think my right hon. Friend has, as yet, quite given an adequate explanation of the contempt which he poured upon the measures proposed to be taken by Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I am tempted to ask what was the object of the speech of my right hon. Friend? If it was intended to be an assertion of his continued adherence to the principles of Home Rule for Ireland, which were embodied in the measures of the late Government, it seems to me that it was scarcely necessary. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition had already spoken, and he had admitted the substantial accuracy of the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech as to the verdict of the country upon the subject. He had, on the same occasion, expressed in the clearest and in the strongest, but at the same time in the most moderate terms, his continued adherence to the principle of the measures which he proposed. Well, Sir, none of us doubted that my right hon. Friend spoke not only for himself, but for his Colleagues in the late Government; and it was quite unnecessary, in my opinion, for my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby to have added his assertion of continued adherence to the same principles. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, on the same occasion, stated that, in his opinion, the main responsibility for the conduct of Irish policy must rest at the present time chiefly upon Her Majesty's present Government. Well, Sir, if my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby agrees in that statement, I am sure he would not willingly say or do anything that would add to the difficulties of Her Majesty's Government in that arduous and responsible task. But, Sir, was there not anything in my right hon. Friend's speech which was calculated to add to those great difficulties—those difficulties which not only have to be confronted by Her Majesty's Government, but which have had to be confronted by so many previous Governments. I cannot help thinking that there was something which was calculated to add to those difficulties, and which I cannot help regretting that my right hon. Friend should have said. He knows that the policy to which my right hon. Friend the late Leader of this House still adheres, and which he would recommend to the House, cannot be accepted by Her Majesty's present Government, and, even if it were proposed by Her Majesty's present Government, could not be accepted by a majority of the House. Whatever opinion my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby may hold as to the probable and future decision of the constituencies of the Kingdom, he must know—as was acknowledged by the Leader of the Opposition—that the verdict of the constituencies, so far as the present Parliament, at all events, is concerned, is final. He must know that the policy which he recommends—and which he honestly recommends—is one which cannot be adopted by the present House. But, Sir, does that fact in the slightest degree absolve the present Government from the duty which is incumbent on every Government, of maintaining, by every means in their power, social order and the supremacy of the law in Ireland? My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby attacked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the statement which he made, that the Government intended to treat the question of social order in Ireland entirely by itself. Now, I did not understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have made that statement as a general one applicable to all circumstances and to all conditions. I understood him to say that it was a proposition applicable to the present state of affairs in Ireland. Well, Sir, does my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby controvert the propriety of that statement in regard to the present circumstances and present conditions which prevail in Ireland? If my right hon. Friend intends to assert the contrary of that proposition, and to say that the question of social order can never, in any circumstances, be treated by itself, I confess that I feel bound to dissent from him. Social disorder in a country is an expression which means crime in that country; and my right hon. Friend cannot intend to assert that it is never, and can never be, the duty of a Government to repress the crime which exists in a country, unless it is prepared, at the same time, to discover, and when discovered to remove, the causes of that social disorder or that crime. The question whether it is possible to remove the causes which militate against social order in a country must depend upon the practicability of their removal. Social disorder may be caused—probably it is caused in Ireland—by political discontent; but it cannot be denied that political discontent may be well founded, or it may be ill founded. I do not quarrel with my right hon. Friend if he says that it is our duty to inquire whether that political discontent is well or ill founded. But whether it can be removed or not must depend on the answer which can be given to the question whether that discontent is well or ill founded; and I cannot assent to the proposition that it is not the duty of the Government to repress the crime which proceeds from that discontent until it has satisfied itself that the political discontent can be removed. My right hon. Friend has, I believe, held the same opinion himself. My right hon. Friend introduced, and conducted ably through this House, the Bill for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland. Perhaps the House will permit me to read a short extract from a speech delivered by my right hon. Friend in 1882 in reference to Ireland. My right hon. Friend said—

"Though the body of Ireland is sound, there is a fearful plague spot upon it. . . . There is, Sir, a cancerous sore in Ireland. . . . It is the sore which springs from the baneful venom of secret societies and unlawful combinations. To that foul disease it is necessary that the surgeon's knife should be applied. We have to cauterize and to extirpate it. . . . This poison that courses through the veins of the Irish social system is revealed in its effects. It breaks out into deeds which are alien altogether to the nature and genius of the Irish people—a people generous, warm-hearted, impulsive; excitable, perhaps, but who are not barbarous, nor cruel, nor savage in their nature. If that be so, what is the history of these midnight outrages and these daylight assassinations, these murders of undefended women and noble men? That is not the work of the mass of the Irish nation. They shrink from such deeds with horror and dismay, aye, and, what is still worse, with terror. These felon and miscreant deeds are the work of secret gangs of nocturnal conspiracies, of hired assassins."—(3 Hansard, [269] 463-4.)

Well, Sir, at that time my right hon. Friend knew very well what was the cause of social disorder in Ireland. He did not think it necessary to make any inquiries into the cause of that social disorder, or to give any further consideration to the matter at all; but he put his finger upon the cause, and said that the cause of this social disorder prevailing in Ireland was to be found in the existence of secret societies in that country. He did not go any further, and feel it necessary to inquire at that time what was the cause that produced the secret societies. He did not think it necessary to unite the question of social disorder with the causes from which it sprang. It was enough for him to know that in Ireland there existed secret societies, and it was enough for him to ask at the time that the House of Commons should apply the surgeon's knife and cut out the gangrene. My right hon. Friend did not explain why, in his judgment, the measure of applying the surgeon's knife was sufficient to deal with any question of social disorder in Ireland. If that were the case then, what has occurred since to make it impossible for him to rely—not upon the application of the surgeon's knife—but upon the milder application of the ordinary law, unless the House consents to investigate, as he now requires it to do, what are the further and ultimate causes of Irish discontent, Irish disaffection, and Irish disorder. The right hon. Gentleman referred also to the question of the land. To my right hon. Friend that question appears now to be one perfectly easy and simple. My right hon. Friend says that all the facts necessary for our consideration are well known. He says that we have the fact of the depreciation of the prices of agricultural produce, and we have the fact that large remissions of rent have been made by many English landlords, and we have the additional fact that Sir James Caird has written a letter to The Times, which he subsequently partially retracted, and that a few months ago The Times published a leading article in the same sense as the letter. To my right hon. Friend these facts appear to convey sufficient knowledge to the House in order to enable them to deal at once, completely, and satisfactorily with the Irish Land Question, and that, therefore, no further inquiry into the subject is needed. But the right hon. Gentleman did not state what he thought was the inference that ought to be drawn from these facts. This state of facts substantially existed four months ago, when the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member introduced the Land Purchase Bill for Ireland. It existed at the time the late Elections were going on; and yet my right hon. Friend in April last, in his speech on the Land Purchase Bill, seems to have drawn altogether a different inference from those facts from that which he draws now. During the period when that Bill was being introduced and during the period of the Election we never heard from either the right hon. Gentleman, or from his Colleagues in Office, anything about these undisputed facts, or the legislation that would be necessary in order to apply these facts to the condition of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman attacks the declaration made by the Prime Minister in "another place," as to the duty incumbent on the State, in the event of unfair rents having been fixed by the Land Commission, to make up to the landlords the difference between the fair value of the holding and the amount of the rent. Well, Sir, I am not going to discuss that question. It appears to me that it would involve an unprofitable expenditure of time to discuss propositions of that kind, which cannot possibly be profitably discussed until they are embodied in the provisions of a Bill of some kind. But if that were not so, why did the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues propose, practically, to adopt that principle in the measure which they presented to the House in April of the present year? [Cries of "No!"] Why, the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues themselves proposed to purchase out the Irish landlords upon the basis of 20 years' purchase of the judicial rents—[Cries of "No!"—with certain reductions, I admit, in certain cases, but upon that general basis. [Mr. BIGGAR: No; not upon that general basis.] If any hon. Member who doubts the accuracy of my statement will read the speech of the Leader of the Opposition on the occasion of the introduction of the Land Purchase Bill, he will see that that measure was based upon the general principle of 20 years' purchase—[Mr. BIGGAR: No!—] and will anyone tell me, therefore, that if it was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman at that time, that there are 538,000 holdings in Ireland—to adopt the dictum of Sir James Caird—that there are 538,000 holdings in Ireland which are incapable of paying any economic rent at all, that the late Government intended nothing when they proposed to give 20 years' purchase of the judicial rents?—[Cries of "No!"—]—and that when they made that proposal they did it with the knowledge that in 500,000 holdings in Ireland reductions would have to be made upon the judicial rents which would reduce the purchase money to nothing at all? My right hon. Friend said that I and my Friends denounced the Land Purchase Act which was introduced by the late Government. As a matter of fact, I said very little indeed about the Land Purchase Act: but what I have said, upon more than one occasion, was that in my judgment, if the Government of Ireland Bill were passed, some Act founded upon similar principles to those contained in the Land Purchase Bill was a measure called for both in equity and in justice. What I pointed out, and what was pointed out still more strongly by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) was that the Land Purchase Bill did propose a very large expenditure and imposed a very large liability upon the British taxpayer, and that this was to be done upon the strength of what seemed to us to be extremely bad security. That, however, is a question upon which I need not enter at length on the present occasion; but when I am told that I have denounced, or have repudiated, the principle upon which the Land Purchase Bill was framed, I altogether contradict the assertion. I never concealed the fact that I agreed with the late Prime Minister, and with the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, as to the propriety of such a Bill as the necessary complement of the Government of Ireland Bill. Sir, I do not think that anyone now dissents from the proposition that any modification of it ought to proceed in the direction of an attempt to increase the efficiency of the Land Purchase Clauses of that Act. If it is generally admitted, as I think it is, that the principle of dual ownership upon which that Act is based has not been successful, if it is admitted that the Act of 1881 cannot be considered a final settlement of the Land Question—if it be admitted that any amendment of that Act ought, if possible, to be directed to the substitution of single ownership for the dual ownership established by the Act—if all that be admitted, it seems to me that it would be extremely desirable, before the House proceeds to make another attempt in the direction of a settlement of the Irish Land Question, that it should be on the basis of the fullest, the most complete, and the most accurate information that can be obtained, both as to the deficiencies and the advantages of the Acts we have hitherto passed, and as to any change in the general agrarian condition of Ireland which may have supervened from other causes. Therefore, I cannot see that there is anything that has been said, either by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham or by myself, or by any hon. Member on this side of the House, which has implied that we should necessarily be predisposed to treat with ridicule any bona fide and sincere attempt to investigate the real condition of the agrarian question in Ireland, or the causes which have prevented the attempt of 1881 from becoming, as we hoped it would, at all events, a final settlement of the question. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) said that an agrarian crisis will be upon us next November, and it would be useless to discover that judicial rents are too high when thousands of tenants would be cast out of their holdings. [Mr. T. P. O'Connor: Through your assistance.] But, Sir, if that is the case, the measures which were proposed by the late Government would have afforded no remedy. The Land Purchase Bill of the late Government would not have come into operation until the appointed day, which certainly was not before the 1st of November next. It could not have had a very sudden or a very rapid operation; and hon. Members from Ireland, and hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, do not seem to have discovered the imminence of this agrarian crisis which is upon us. Representatives from Ireland appear to have been perfectly ready to acquiesce in this agrarian crisis coming upon us next November and the eviction of those hundreds and thousands of tenants—[Cries of "No!"—in consideration of the political benefits proposed by the Irish Government Bill of the late Government to be conferred upon them. Sir, it has been said that the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given advice to the Irish landlords to exercise their rights with relentless severity, and to exact their rents to the uttermost farthing. I cannot say that I heard in the speech any expression that would bear that interpretation. I was glad to hear, in the earlier part of this evening, the Chief Secretary for Ireland absolutely repudiate any such interpretation of any words which fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not think that any such interpretation was any more fair to the Chancellor of the Exchequer than it would be fair to say that certain expressions which fell from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition as to the probability, under existing circumstances, that judicial rents were in some cases too high to be paid by the tenants was a general invitation to refuse the payment of rent. Sir, I do not think that we ought, in circumstances such as those in which we are placed, to go out of our way to endeavour to force interpretations upon the words of public men of one side or the other of the House which they are not intended to bear, and which it would be most injurious to the public interest that they should be strained to bear. It is obviously in the interests of all classes connected with land in Ireland—it is in the interest of the public; it is in the interest of the State—that at such a time as this, which is undoubtedly a time of pressure and hardship upon all classes in England, Scotland, or Ireland who are connected with land, that the rights of landlords—even if those rights have been recently ascertained, and, to a certain extent, guaranteed under State interference—should be exercised with forbearance and moderation. Sir, I do not believe Her Majesty's present Government intend to offer one word in a different spirit to the advice given by the late Conservative Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—that the landlords of Ireland should exercise their rights with prudence and moderation. Certainly, it is not for the public interest that they should do otherwise; but, certainly, it is equally to the disadvantage of the public interest that any encouragement should be given to the idea that Her Majesty's Executive Government will or can refuse to make use of the powers of the law which are entrusted to them for the purpose of enforcing the legal rights of those who have the right to exercise them. Her Majesty's Government are aware, and this House is aware, that this is not a matter which is entirely within the discretion of Her Majesty's Government. Individuals of all classes, whether they be landlords or whether they be others, have their rights, and have a right to appeal to law; and it is not in the power of this Government, or of any Government, to raise itself as a dispensing power superior to the law when the rights of others are imperilled. And no greater disservice could be done to the tenants of Ireland, or to the cause of social order in that country, than to induce any class of Irishmen to believe that there exists in the hands of any Government such a dispensing power to override the legal rights of any class of Her Majesty's subjects. Sir, this view was held by Her Majesty's late Government. A speech was made in this House by my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), in which he was supposed for the time to have claimed for the Irish Government such a dispensing power; but that interpretation of the speech was denied both in this House, and by Lord Spencer in the Upper House, and the Government, as it was its duty, and as it had no alternative in doing, altogether disclaimed any intention of setting itself up as a power superior to the ordinary law. Now, Sir, perhaps I may be allowed to allude, very briefly indeed, to another question which was referred to in the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the question of public works in Ireland. That has been denounced by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby as a proposal, in a disguised form, to confer demoralizing alms upon the people of Ireland. I agree with my right hon. Friend that anything in the nature of disguised alms would be most injurious to the people of Ireland themselves, and that nothing could be more injurious to the people of Great Britain, at whose expense they would be given; but the question is whether it is possible to undertake an expenditure of public money in Ireland which shall not be in the nature of disguised alms to the Irish people. There can, I think, be very little doubt that an inquiry of the character proposed to be undertaken by the Government would be one of the first undertakings which an Irish National Government would be likely to take in hand; and it does not seem to me unreasonable that we, having refused to establish an Irish National Government, should endeavour to do that which, in our opinion, is reasonable, and what an Irish Government would be likely to do for itself. It appears to me that it is a subject worth inquiring into, whether there are not in Ireland certain classes of public works which cannot, in the present state of Ireland at all events, be undertaken by private enterprise, but which may, with a reasonable prospect of success, be undertaken by the Government. We all know very well, unfortunately, that the state of Ireland is such at the present time—and it is not likely for some time to be otherwise—as not to induce private capital to be expended upon works of this description. We know also that there are certain classes of public works in Ireland, such as arterial drainage, which could hardly, under any circumstances, be undertaken by private enterprise, because, in order to enable such works to be undertaken, large legislative powers would have to be conferred on a Company that Parliament would be very unlikely to confer upon a private body. Well, Sir, I do not know whether the Government look forward with great hope to this proposal; but, at all events, it appears to me that, however much information may have resulted from previous inquiries, and may have been collected on many subjects, there is not in the possession of this House, or of the Government, that practical information of the nature that is proposed to be obtained by the Government which would enable the Government to propose to Parliament to adopt any considerable expenditure of the public money in Ireland. I do not think, certainly, that we are in possession of information which would warrant any such expenditure of public money now. But, on the other hand, I maintain that we are not in possession of such complete information on the subject as would justify us in saying that under no circumstances should public money be so granted. I will not detain the House on the question of local government in Ireland at any length. I do not believe there is any Party in this House who will seriously object to the intention of the Government to postpone the consideration of that subject until next February. I have already said that it is impossible for the present Government, or for the present Parliament, to deal with the question of local government as my right hon. and hon. Friends on this side of the House think it ought to be dealt with. If an attempt is to be made to deal with it on different lines, and on a different basis, surely, Sir, it is desirable that some interval, some time for reflection, some time for those passions to calm down which have been excited should be afforded; and certainly, if we are to approach this question of local government for Ireland, and also for the whole of the United Kingdom, it is desirable in the interests, not of Ireland alone, but of the whole of the United Kingdom, that we should approach it in that temper which can only be produced by some delay, and some period for reflection. In conclusion, I can only say I trust that a fair and a candid consideration and trial will be given to the policy which has been thus fully explained by Her Majesty's Government. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby has complained, or has said—for I do not know whether he complained—that the policy of the late Government was condemned without a trial. Surely my right hon. Friend must know that the decision of the House on such proposals as those which were laid before us by the late Government must necessarily be made without a trial. The measure, whether it were good or whether it were bad, was one which, in its nature, was an irrevocable step, from which there was no return. We were bound and obliged to form our opinion on the merits or demerits of that policy as they were laid before us by the Government, and from the circumstances and the nature of the case it was impossible that anything in the nature of an experimental trial should be afforded. But, Sir, that is no reason why a trial should not be given to the policy which is now explained by Her Majesty's Government. If it is less extensive, less ambitious, less far-reaching, less heroic in its aims than the policy which was rejected by the late Parliament, at all events it cannot be denied that it does not present those dangers and those risks from which we recoil, and from which the country has recoiled. Sir, if the policy of the late Government was, as my right hon. Friends think, founded on justice and on reason, that policy must ultimately prevail. Their case will not be prejudiced, but it will rather be strengthened, by a fair and an honest attempt, on the part of all Parties in this House, to give a fair, an honest, and a candid consideration to a policy which is intended, at all events, to give to Ireland a period of rest and of repose, and to afford an opportunity for the institution of sound and practicable reforms in that country, which has for so many years distracted the deliberations of this House and perplexed the statesmanship of this country.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to find myself able to echo most cordially the sentiments with which my noble Friend has just concluded his very forcible speech. I have never been one of those who have denied to Dissident Liberals the perfect right and freedom of discussing the measure which my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) proposed almost as unsparingly and as impartially as if the criticism had come from Ministers of the opposite Party. Again, when my noble Friend said that he had never used any language other than the language of respect towards my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, as far as I know he is amply justified in that statement he made. My noble Friend himself, and many of those who acted with him in what I well know they must have found to be a painful and an embarrassing position, have behaved as we should have expected from English citizens of their position and character. So much, however, cannot be said by all those who have taken part in the controversy. But, Sir, when we look to the future, I confess that I hear very little in the language and observations, and see very little in the attitude, of my noble Friend which encourages the hope that those embarrassments and divisions which have so distressed and perplexed the country are likely soon to come to an end. I feel, Sir, that we must all of us accept the position. Whether those who do not agree with us have or have not forfeited their claim to Liberalism, I, for one, will not now attempt to decide. All that we now say is that a new emergency, and a great emergency, has arisen, and that we think we are applying to that emergency the old principles of our Party. We not only think, but we know, that we have with us the great majority of the Liberal voters. We must wait and see whether circumstances will not justify us in our view of the Irish crisis, and we shall certainly spare no efforts in our endeavour to convert the constituencies to our way of thinking. Sir, my noble Friend has said, as the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary said at an earlier part of the evening, that it was unreasonable to take up a position which implied that Her Majesty's Government are not bound, whatever may be the ultimate solution of the Irish Constitutional difficulty, to do their best to preserve law and order in the meantime. That is a proposition which none of us, I think, on this side of the House shall for a moment deny. But I cannot help remembering that very much the same body of Gentlemen as those who now discharge the duties of Her Majesty's Government were in power not so many months ago, and it was their duty then, as it is now, to preserve order and to put down disturbance. Well, did they do so? Why, we had a debate in this House on the 4th of March last, in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) gave a rather pathetic account of the attempts of that Government, in the autumn of 1865, to keep law and order. What were the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman? He said—

"That during the last months of 1885 he applied himself to the task of the administration of justice with whatever abilities he possessed, and certainly with unremitting attention. The Criminal Law was put in force on every possible occasion; every effort was made to maintain the reign of law and order; but, nevertheless, the social condition of the country did not improve." — V. Howard, [302] 1921-2.

I ask on what grounds right hon. Gentlemen opposite can expect now to be able to perform that duty, on which they laid so much stress, when they have no more means of preserving order than they had in the last months of 1885? I cannot see why, exactly, as they failed in the concluding months of 1885, they will not be found to have failed in the concluding months of 1886. Sir, the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the figures of crime which he quoted the other day, in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), did not quite see my right hon. Friend's point. Our point is this—Why is it that you, who insisted, on the 26th of January, 1886, that there was a state of things which justified coercion now, when the state of things is very much the same as it was then, no longer believe in the policy and the remedies which you then thought urgent? You are in this dilemma. You either made a mistake on the 26th of January, when you asked for coercion, or you are making a mistake now. In either case it is difficult to avoid a suspicion of political levity and insincerity. The noble Lord and the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland have told us that there are two centres of disturbance and disorder in Ireland; and they propose to deal with both one and the other—both with the North and South. So far as the North is concerned, and the riots in Belfast, we shall, I believe, have an early opportunity of discussing the question very fully, before the debate closes, on a special Amendment relating to those disturbances. I will only point out one very remarkable statement, illustrating the spirit in which the late Government was judged by the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), when he said, although his own Leaders have warned him of the fatal effect of disparaging the Royal Constabulary, that there had been a conspiracy—I took his words down at the time—to degrade the town of Belfast. He said that Catholic Constabulary had gone down to Belfast with the special intention of massacring their Protestant fellow-subjects. [Mr. JOHNSTON: Hear, hear!'] Some hon. Member on the other side of the House has the courage of his opinions, and says "Hear, hear." [Cries of "Johnston—Ballykilbeg!"] I am not going to dwell upon that point. I will only make this one remark—I merely ask the hon. Member to realize what it is that he implies when he says that. He means that the late Lord Lieutenant, Lord Aberdeen, who is a Protestant, and I, who am not exactly a domineering Catholic, instructed the Under Secretary, who is a Protestant, to direct the Inspector General, who is a Protestant, to collect a force of Catholic Constabulary to massacre Protestants in the streets of Belfast. That is the position of the hon. Member for South Belfast. Perhaps we shall hear more of it by-and-bye. There is another point in connection with the Belfast riots to which I will call attention. The Chief Secretary told us on the first night of the Session that there will be an extension of the scope of the inquiry of the Commission on the outrages in Belfast. As a matter of fact, in answer to my Question to-day, he told us what the extension would be. There is no extension whatever of the terms of the Commission, but only an alleged change of interpretation, which is no change at all, because it is the interpretation which we intended at the time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL): Paddington, S. : Its scope will also be indicated by the legal and Parliamentary powers it is proposed to confer upon the Commissioners.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Quite true, as the Government are going to bring in another Bill, of which I entirely approve. But that does not alter the scope of the inquiry. It is alleged that we had excluded the police from the scope of the inquiry. That is an entire misapprehension. Every possible circumstance in connection with the riots was taken into our purview, and stated in the Lord Lieutenant's Warrant. Therefore, there ought to be no misapprehension. Sir, as to the state of the counties of Kerry and Clare and the districts of Limerick and Galway, I am amused that the noble Lord and the Party opposite and their Friends on this side should think it possible to divorce the consideration of restoring social order from such matters as the Land Question. The noble Lord himself said that outrages of a certain form were most common in the county of Kerry, and he also told us that in Kerry there are two landlords for whose protection a force of no less than 70 Constabulary is employed. Does a fact like that show that there is no connection between social disturbance and the Land Question? The noble Lord gave us the figures of crime in the disturbed counties, and he said, truly enough, that agrarian crime is chiefly prevalent in Connaught and Munster. I will take the liberty of supplementing the noble Lord's figures of crime with the figures of eviction. I want to illustrate the extraordinary fallacy of supposing that you can consider the question of the restoration of social order without considering the existence of the agrarian question. In 1885 the outrages in Ulster and Leinster were 216; and in Connaught and Munster they were 790. The evictions of families in Ulster and Leinster were 1,268, and in Connaught and Munster 1,859. That is to say, where you have most evictions there you have most outrages. In the first six months of the present year, in Ulster and Leinster 703 families were evicted, and in Connaught and Munster 1,304. The outrages in Ulster and Leinster were 103, and in Connaught and Munster they were 450. The House will not suppose that I am for one moment saying that evictions are an excuse for outrages; but I say that they are an explanation of outrages, and that they prove that the root of social disorder is somehow or other to be found in the agrarian question. This is not a mere abstract consideration; it has a very close and direct bearing upon the policy which Her Majesty's Government have foreshadowed; because they are going to take measures—of which I will say a word presently—to stop outrage, on the one hand, and to encourage evictions on the other. The noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) has found fault with my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) for fastening that signification upon the language and proposals of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I defy anybody to read the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer now, and not to recognize that in every line of it there is an assurance to the landlords that they will have the uttermost farthing wrung for them from the tenants. [Cries of "No!"] I say "Yes!" and that an assurance of that kind coming from so important a Minister is, in effect, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby said, an invitation and an incitement to the landlords to proceed to evictions. While you are sending a General to put down midnight crime you are providing work for your General to do. While you are attempting—and I admit sincerely attempting—to dam the stream of agrarian crime, you are replenishing the tributaries from which that stream is fed. So far as the special measures are concerned which the Government have promised to take in the case of Kerry I do not like to say anything. The demoralization in Kerry is so great that anybody, who is responsible for even a decent semblance of order in that county, may be excused for resorting to almost any expedient in order to get at the root of the mischief. But, after six months' study of the condition of things in Kerry, Galway, Limerick, and Clare, it seems to me very doubtful indeed whether very much good can come from sending there a person of the eminent position and high character of General Buller. I am not at all certain that that is the kind of thing that you want. I am not at all sure that he will be able to perform, or to stimulate the performance, of those duties connected with the detection of crime which are likely to bring about a better state of things in Kerry. What is the real evil? It is an evil that no General can touch. It is that the public opinion of the country, and all the district, is against the restoration of law and order, and in favour of the concealment of these midnight marauders and criminals from the officers of justice. What is your General to do in the presence of facts such as occurred in my period of office, and are doubtless occurring now—where a man who has been shot refuses to identify those who have shot him, although the police knew perfectly well that he knew who shot him and could identify them? In other cases, men who have been attacked and who, in the exasperation of the moment, have consented to identify their assailants, have remained silent when the time has come for them to give evidence in Court, and have refused to identify anyone. How do you hope to be able, by sending down General Buller to the disturbed districts, to restore law and order, or bring about a better state of things in a country where public opinion is so corrupted and perverted? The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) told you what was the right remedy. We believed him. He said, and we believed, that he and his Friends detested the crimes perpetrated in Kerry quite as much as any other hon. Members in this House. ["Oh, oh!"] It will not, I am sure, be denied by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he is present, that the National League has done its very best—and that it has been unsuccessful shows how very deep down the demoralization lies—it will not be denied that the National League has done its best to put down disorder and disturbance in Kerry. [Renewed cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Members opposite know more about it than I do, and more, no doubt, than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary does. But I will warrant that if the Chief Secretary were here he would not contradict what I am now saying. I return to my point, which is that the hon. Member for Cork was right when he used these words in his memorable speech on the Government of Ireland Bill—

"Try the effect of self government; and if Kerry men then resort to outrages, they will very soon find that the rest of Ireland will put a stop to them"—3 Hansard, 326, 1170.

The noble Marquess who has just sat down indulged in a good deal of satire at the expense of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, on the ground that he had been a party to bring in the Crimes Act of 1882, and had advanced certain propositions in support of that Act which do not exactly square with the position taken up by my right hon. Friend to-day. But why do you not bring in a Crimes Act yourselves? If my right hon. Friend is inconsistent in not using the same language to-day as he thought fit to use when he introduced the Crimes Act in 1882, how are you less inconsistent when, on January the 26th, you declared that it was necessary and indispensable that the National League should be suppressed, and that exceptional legislation should be introduced—how are you less inconsistent in not introducing such legislation now? My right hon. Friend is not inconsistent because in 1882 he alluded to the surgeon's knife. The surgeon's knife has been applied to Ireland and it has failed. Well, the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that there is a great difference now, and that Her Majesty's Government are not inconsistent in not asking for repressive legislation, in spite of the existence of a similar state of things in Ireland now as existed in January last when they did ask for it, because the situation has been altered by the action of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, who, he says, is now the Leader of the Nationalist Party. [Ministerial cheers.] What, you cheer that now, although two or three hours ago you cheered the statement of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he said that my right hon. Friend had made the position a great deal more difficult than it was previously! Now, Sir, I wish hon. Gentlemen opposite would make up their minds as to whether our action and our proposed legislation have made the position of the Government in respect of keeping law and order easier or more difficult? The noble Lord said that we had made it easier. [Cries of "No!"] The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said that we had made it more difficult. [Cries of "No!"] Sir, I myself agree with the noble Lord. I admit the first and primary task of the Government to be that of doing what they can to preserve law and order; but I firmly believe that our legislative proposals have made your task far easier, because you have now, at all events, this conviction in the mind of the Irish population which gives them a measure of patience such as I believe they have never had before—the conviction that though our proposals have for a time been rejected, yet that these proposals have been and are still, not in the letter, but in the spirit and in principle, supported by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, by those who were his Colleagues, and by an enormous mass of the voters of Great Britain. It is that conviction, and the patience which springs from it, that will, I hope and believe, make your task much easier, if you have the courage to face it. But I must confess, Sir, that I am disappointed—I hope only for a time—in the narrowness of the proposals which Her Majesty's Government have foreshadowed, and which the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, to our still greater surprise, for reasons that I shall have to refer to presently, finds completely adequate and satisfactory. The proposal for the issue of these Commissions is, on the whole, a process with which it is very difficult to find fault. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Hear, hear!'] I quite agree with my right hon. Friend who cheers that, that it is the business of Parliaments and Governments to supply themselves with all the information that it is possible to obtain before they proceed to legislation. But I will point out one great difference between the Commission to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred as the precedent for the Commission which the Government are about to issue. The noble Lord said—"You quarrel with us for proposing to issue a Land Commission. Why, in 1880, you yourselves issued a Land Commission." That was the Beesborough Commission. Well, Sir, that is quite true; but there is all the difference between the Commission of 1880 and the Land Commission of Her Majesty's Government. The Beesborough Commission of 1880 was issued as preliminary to a Bill, which the Government announced their intention of bringing forward. But your Land Commission is one to inquire whether there is to be a Bill; whether it is proper and expedient to bring forward a Bill or not. It is plain that there is all the difference in the world between the issue of that Commission and such a Commission as this. Then, again, Sir, I should like to point out, in the second place, that this issuing of your Land Commission, from the terms in which you announce it, is calculated to have a very remarkable and a very mischievous effect upon social order in Ireland in October and November next; and I will tell the House why. The Commission is to inquire whether or not there has been such a fall in the price of produce as to justify and warrant the proposition that rents are too high. But what will be the effect of an announcement of that kind? What does it put at once into the minds both of the landlords and the tenants? Why, Sir, this. The landlord will know that it is to his interest to extort the uttermost farthing from his tenants, in order to prove that rents are not too high and need no re-adjustment; while the tenants, on the other hand, have an equal interest, from the same standpoint of impressing the minds of the Commissioners, in not paying their rent, in order that this Commission of Inquiry may be led to conclude that rents are too high and do urgently require revision. If hon. Members on either side consider the effect of that, they will perceive that the influence upon social order in the months of October and November must be most mischievous. I should like to put another question in reference to the Land Commission. One of the branches of Reference is as to whether there is such secret terrorism as to paralyze industry and discourage capital; and I want to know who is going to tell the Commissioners whether there is this terrorism which paralyzes industry or not? Where are the Commissioners going to get any new information worth having on this most important question?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing), interrupting, was understood to demur to the terms of the Reference as quoted by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The Commission is to inquire whether there is any intimidation. That is one of the points of the Reference.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: The noble Lord's words were—"In what part of Ireland combinations to resist the force of legal obligations affect the Land Act of 1881." Undoubtedly, these "combinations" we all understand to mean the operations of the National League; and those operations are supposed to involve terrorism. But, Sir, who is going to tell the Commission anything on this subject? The landlord's story we know. We need no inquiry for that. Then, are the victims and the dupes of this terrorism going before the Commission in Dublin, Tralee, or Limerick, or wherever the place may be, to give evidence to the effect that they are terrorized and their industry paralyzed, and that they would pay their rents if they dared? If so, they cannot be very violently terrorized, and the combination cannot be a very formidable one. Who, besides the landlords and the terrorized tenants, are to give information? Are the police and the Resident Magistrates to give evidence? Why, you have every mouth full and authentic reports from the Resident and District Magistrates, and you know exactly from the best authorities the effect these combinations have on the relations of landlord and tenant. Therefore, Sir, one of the most important points of your Reference will be absolutely inoperative. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, and the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night repeated the argument, that one of the points on which you were most anxious for information was how best to deal with the surplus population and the other evils of the congested districts. Why, you know very well that there are very few Members of this House, who have taken any interest whatever in Irish affairs, who are not perfectly well acquainted with the condition and temper of the population of the congested districts, and I do not believe there is one of them who will deny this assertion—that it would be more than the existence of any Government is worth, more than the peace of Ireland is worth, for any British Government, whether Liberal or Tory, to attempt to deal in a large way with the population of the congested districts in question, and in the only way that would be conducive to the amelioration of their condition, and that it is only a Native Irish Government at whose hands they will tolerate the bringing home to them of the only remedy that their situation is capable of. There are, on the Front Bench, at least three or four Members of the Government who are well acquainted with the condition of the population of the congested districts. I do not believe there is one of them who will get up and deny the truth of this assertion—that it would be more than the existence of any Government is worth, more than the peace of Ireland would be worth, for any British Government to attempt to deal in a large way with the population of the congested districts in the West of Ireland. You can only do it—it would only be tolerated and suffered to be done by a Government of their own choosing and of their own people. A great deal has been said about the Land Question; but it can be more usefully discussed in connection with an Amendment that is to be brought forward by the hon. Member for Cork to-morrow. That Amendment will put all the issues before the House, and afford an opportunity to hon. Members for going fully into the matter. I can only say that the language of my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale in respect of the Land Question to-night is not perfectly in accord with the language of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because my noble Friend seems to anticipate that a new Land Act will have to be produced. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] Yes; but the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer certainly said pretty plainly that no revision of the Land Act of 1881 was in the minds of the Government at the present moment, and that, on the contrary, they regarded the Land Act of 1881 as containing in it the elements of finality. My noble Friend the Member for Rossendale does not think so, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night, I am bound to say, in consequence possibly of representations that may have been made to him since the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, did take rather a new line, and implied that we are to look out for a new Land Bill. Now, Sir, I have always said that the settlement of the Land Question was an indispensable preliminary or accompaniment to any attempt to restore order in Ireland, and I think it will be found that you are going to have a Land Bill upon the lines that were shadowed forth—not mentioned in this House—but shadowed forth in "another place" by the Prime Minister. If you are going to have a Land Bill that is to fasten upon the taxpayers of this country the difference—the capitalized difference—between what the landlords of Ireland are now receiving and what they ought, on a fair market value, to be receiving, decidedly the country will wish that they had accepted our Land Bill rather than the Bill of the Government. I notice that the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale said nothing to-night on that subject. He said nothing upon the payment by the State of the difference between the true value of the rent and the value as fixed by the Land Commissioners. Sir, in reference to the immediate question of evictions I only want to make one remark. The noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale has echoed the spirit of the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the propriety and expediency and justice of enforcing legal obligations, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night pointed out that the Land Act of 1831 contains a clause by which all tenants under agreement—that is to say, all tenants whose rents have not been fixed by the Land Commissioners—may go before the Court and plead extenuating circumstances and get a stay of eviction. But, as my hon. Friend the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has said, how can you suppose that these miserable people in the West of Ireland—if they are paying an excessive rent, or cannot pay the rent demanded of them—how are they, in their squalor and helplessness, to appear before the Land Court and plead for a stay of eviction? I cannot imagine a more preposterous form of solace than that. Reference has been made to-night by the noble Marquess to a speech which I made in the early part of my official career, as to the necessity of some power being given to stay evictions. I then said that it was greatly to be regretted that there was not a power somewhere or other to discriminate between cases where tenants can pay and cases where tenants cannot pay. That remark was very unfavourably received in many quarters where I expected it would have met with favour. I have, since that remark was made, taken a great deal of trouble to see whether it has occurred to lawyers and judicial functionaries in Ireland to consider whether it was not possible that some such equity and some such discriminating power could be introduced. It is too late now; but I did find that there were judicial authorities of no inconsiderable eminence who believed that it might be possible and would be acceptable, if Parliament could be got to assent to it, for a tenant to go to those tribunals to which the landlord now goes for an ejectment—mostly the County Courts—and to plead conditions which would excuse him, for a time at least, from having the extreme process of eviction put in force against him. It would, of course, be rash for me or any other than a Minister of the Crown to father proposals of that kind; but I do hope that the Government will turn them over in their mind in the autumn which is to pass before Parliament re-assembles and see whether something cannot be done in that direction. I should not be surprised if they were to encourage such a movement. At all events, I am sure that unless they do they will run great risks—I hope I shall not be interpreted as holding out any threat—and that within a certain number of months, unless something is done in that direction, there will undoubtedly be serious peril of great social disturbances. I hope my right hon. Friend near me, after what he has said on the subject, will use all the influence he possesses—which, considering the position he occupies, ought to be considerable—with right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, in promoting a policy of that kind. Now, Sir, I only want to say one word on the subject of the smaller Commission. That Commission, I am afraid, is a very small Commission for running up a very big bill. We know something upstairs of what engineers, contractors, and experts can do when they are consulted as to schemes, and when I think of Irish engineers, contractors, and experts being consulted by the Imperial Government as to what can be done in the way of the amelioration of the condition of Ireland by public works, I confess that the vision which opens itself to my mind is one of the most appalling that I can conceive. They will be very unworthy of their professional reputation if they do not prove to demonstration that many millions and scores of millions can be expended in Ireland to the greatest possible advantage. But what I am surprised at is, that at this time of day any serious or responsible Government can dream of instituting a Commission to deal with points and questions of this kind. Have they forgotten that only last year there was a Committee sitting upstairs on Irish Industries, the result of whose labours appeared in a Blue Book of 1,000 pages? Are they aware of the existence of all that evidence, and do they believe that a Commission sitting between this and the end of the year will be able to add one jot or tittle to the evidence already taken? I, for my part, entirely doubt it. I have read that Blue Book pretty carefully, and I say that I cannot imagine any scheme devised by the ingenuity of man which is not defended by witnesses examined before that Committee. They had before them some of the best experts who could be got together in railway management, in mining, in civil engineering, and in every branch which this small Commission is to include; and I say that the evidence on canals, mines, arterial drainage, railways, and fisheries is complete. I say that, after all the evidence collected in past years, there was only one Committee needed to consider the evidence, and that was the Committee of 14 or 15 Gentlemen who constitute Her Majesty's Government. They have ample materials on which to form their judgment in the evidence given; they must have been aware of this, and I cannot imagine that they suppose the evidence can in any way be invalidated, or that any further information or suggestions will be brought before the Commission which they have announced their intention of appointing. Now, Sir, with regard to the proposal to spend millions of our money upon public works in Ireland, I, myself, regard it as of more doubtful expediency, when it is performed by a British Government, and under the supervision of a British Parliament—I regard it as of more doubtful expediency than any proposal which I can imagine Her Majesty's Government could put forward. It is true, as has been stated to-night, that Irish Members below the Gangway have demanded the expenditure of money on public works in Ireland; and so long as they could not get these works taken in hand in any other way, I should not blame them. But these Gentlemen knew at the time they were calling for them that, however excellent they were in their purpose, they would be a hundred times better performed, and better adapted to the ends they were intended to accomplish, if they were taken in hand even with lessened resources, with a poorer Treasury, by an Irish Government and an Irish Parliament. It is just the difference between an estate managed by the Court of Chancery and an estate managed by the owner who is on the spot, and whose mind is constantly turning to the improvement of the estate. If our Bill had been passed, and if there had been an Irish Legislature to superintend and an Irish Executive to carry out many of those works which have been advocated in Ireland, and which Her Majesty's Government hold out some hope of having carried out, then I believe that enormous good would have been done to Ireland; and not only do I believe that, but I believe it would have been one of the first tasks taken in hand by an Irish Government? But, Sir, I protest, with all the force of which I am capable, against the British Government undertaking a vast expenditure of public funds upon works with regard to which Irish Members have not been consulted, which Irish Members will not supervise, and over which it is probable that the Irish Representatives will have no more control than they have had on the suggested issue of a Commission. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland said to-night that his Friends and he were in favour of a policy of decentralization. But these great works of yours—how will you decentralize the administration of these enormous works? They are works for which provision is to be made out of the Public Exchequer. You are not going to allow enormous sums from the Exchequer to be expended without supervision by the agents of the Exchequer. You now expend considerable sums in Ireland, but you do not give it to the Local Authorities; and I am sure you are not going to intrust the expenditure of these funds to the Local Authorities in Ireland without State supervision. Well, then, you must have State supervision, and the moment you have that you must have a State Institution, as you have now in the Board of Works. But, if you read the Blue Book I have already referred to, you will find that, although everybody has a scheme which he wishes the Government to undertake, yet everyone equally protests against the way in which the Board of Works does business, checks enterprize, and defeats the object in view. I am not for a moment saying that these charges against the Board of Works are just; but I say that the Board of Works are a centralizing body over which the Gentlemen from Ireland have no control. Clearly, if you are going to create a large spending Department in Ireland, you will have naturally to appoint over it a permanent Board of officials to supervise the expenditure;

and I say it is folly to talk of decentralization so long as in all that expenditure, and in all the details of these public works, the Representatives of Ireland will have no voice, will never be consulted, and will never be able to exercise any effective supervision. But you will say that this House will exercise supervision. Sir, I say that if the supervision of Parliament means supervision by this House of the Executive administration in Ireland, it is fatal to the efficiency of the Irish Executive, and fatal to the success of Irish administration. We know very well what supervision by this House of Irish government means; it means that the House takes the word of the Chief Secretary for Ireland for what is done, and that Irish Members may take what line they please, make what protests they please; but the majority of the House, being ignorant and ill-informed, will naturally suppose that the Chief Secretary for Ireland knows what is right better than they do. I contend that, although you are going to set up Local Authorities, you are about, by this great expenditure of public money, to feed and give new nourishment to the centralizing system, and now discouragement to the interests of Irishmen in the affairs of their country. One other announcement is that you are going to extend local government in Ireland upon the same principles as those which you intend to apply to the extension of local government in England and Scotland. We are to have equality, similarity, and simultaneity. As to simultaneity, I only ask whether Lord Salisbury was in favour of simultaneity when he said he would give Ireland local government after 20 years of coercion, and whether we, in England and Scotland, are also to wait 20 years for local government? No much for simultaneity. One word about equality and similarity. I wish to ask the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who favours this formula, two things. He says you are to have equality and similarity as between the powers of Local Authorities in Ireland and those in England and Scotland. Now, is the noble Lord going to give to the new Local Authorities in Ireland that control over the expenditure of local taxation, and over local valuation and assessment, which is possessed, and I hope will be possessed, by the Local Authorities in England and Scotland? One other point. When the noble Lord talks of equality and similarity, is he going to give to the Local Authorities in Ireland control over the police? I am perfectly sure that he is going to do nothing of the kind. I certainly shall regard it as a very grave thing if the noble Lord makes any such proposal. I have mentioned these two points to illustrate the rashness with which the noble Lord has committed himself to the principle of equality and similarity as between local government in Ireland and Great Britain. This I have to say, that if you extend the power of Local Authorities in Ireland, without a guiding and controlling central authority, you will increase and aggravate every mischief and every danger that now besets you. Your only course, if you wish to move safely in the path of the development of local self-government in Ireland, is to give a strengthening and guiding hand to the Local Authority. Nothing can be more misleading than to talk as if there was identity of position and spirit between Great Britain and Ireland, which ought to be carried out in identity of institutions. The conditions of Great Britain and of Ireland are in most respects absolutely different. There is difference of race. England is rich, Ireland is poor. England has a thoroughly united population; the population of Ireland is unfortunately not united. In England we have a great middle class; in Ireland there is scarcely a middle class at all. I might go on till I weary the House with the difference between Ireland and England on such points. In the face of all these differences in the very foundations of social order, it is the most misleading proposition that any statesman can advance—that an institution which is good for Great Britain is therefore good for Ireland. I humbly subscribe to what was quoted the other night by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, from Mr. Disraeli, when he said that—“Almost the reverse of the institutions which are fitted for England is what are fitted for Ireland.” I, for one, have been a partizan and an advocate of self-government for Ireland, because I believed that those proposals, and the self-government to which they would give rise, would give Ireland a strong Central Government, would not

fritter away authority, and would not, as your proposals would, multiply the centres of resistance to, and attack on, the Imperial Parliament. The more this question is looked into, the more the difficulties are examined—enough has been said in this debate to show it—the more clearly will it be seen that we shall never get on the right line of improvement in Ireland—improvement in the relations between the people of Great Britain and the people of Ireland—until you give them a Statutory Parliament and an Executive Government responsible to it. You will never otherwise advance a step on the road towards a final and permanent settlement. I confess I was surprised to-night when my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale seemed to express some approval of these very limited and narrow proposals for local self-government for Ireland. For I had understood my noble Friend, in the later speeches which he delivered during the Election, to say that he was in favour of a central authority in Ireland, provided that it complied with four or five conditions which he enumerated. I cannot recognize my noble Friend's position taken in those last speeches of his, with the position of acquiescence in any proposals so narrow and meagre as those shadowed forth by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. One speech of his struck me immensely, because I thought I saw in a sentence of the noble Lord's the hopes of reconciliation between the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham and our views. My noble Friend says that he felt that, after all that had been done and all that had been proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, Ireland would require a measure of local self-government different from and wider than that which he thought would be sufficient for England. He repudiated equality and similarity. Therefore, I confess I am surprised and disappointed that, to-night, my noble Friend should not have a word of remonstrance to address to Her Majesty's Government when they take up a diametrically opposite position to that on which he won his election. When you say you have a mandate to preserve the Union, I acknowledge it to be quite true; and when you say that your first business is to preserve law and order, that is quite true also, if you can do it without more organic remedies than you have yet proposed. But when you say that the mandate of this House was confined to restoring and preserving law and order, and providing some small measure of local self-government, I defy you or your allies on this side of the House to prove that that was, in the least degree, the mandate of the constituencies at the last Election. Their mandate was, I admit, unfavourable to the proposals which we endeavoured to press on them; but, in my opinion, the judgment of the constituencies which returned Conservative Members and those who returned Unionist Liberals was, that the Government of the day, of whomever it might be composed, should take in hand as soon as possible a reconstruction of the Irish Government upon the broadest lines compatible with Parliamentary supremacy and Imperial unity. I say it is inevitable that circumstances will compel you to take the task in hand in that wide sense, and with that wide interpretation. Nay, further, and with this I have done—I say that the moment you advance along that road, the road which I believe the English and Scotch constituencies wish you to take, you will have to travel as far as we asked you to travel, and to bring in proposals which, however they may differ in detail, will be, in spirit and in principle, identical with those which we brought forward.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Sir, there were two points decided by the late Election—one, that there shall be no Parliament in these Realms other than this one; and the other, that there shall be no impediment to this Government in maintaining law and order in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government, in the speeches we have heard, have shown firmness and frankness—qualities which were sadly absent when the affairs of the country were guided by the late Government; but I hope that the brave words of the Ministry before me will be followed by acts. Next, I desire to see a distinct principle laid down that there shall be no rival Executive in Dublin. It is quite true that, unless considerable firmness is shown in the present juncture, we shall drift back into the policy of the past. By the voice of the constituencies,

the authors and avowers of the policy of fear have been relegated to a position which is more suitable to Gentlemen of their mettle; and, under these circumstances, I do not think that the present occupants of the Treasury Bench have any cause for alarm if they act fearlessly. I was particularly gratified to hear the declaration of Her Majesty's Government—that if the ordinary law proved insufficient for the maintenance of order in Ireland, they would not hesitate to have recourse to a November Session; and I am sure that many of us will willingly return from our avocations, in order to insure that the Queen's writ shall run without let or hindrance. One may call the best of dogs by a bad name, and hang him; but the equity of the English law will be none the less, because it is libelled by the name of coercion, which is but the authority of the law supporting its justice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), a day or two ago, treated us to some extensive platitudes about the fundamental principles which he says have guided the Party to which he belongs; but, as a humble student of the distinguished and somewhat notorious career of the right hon. Gentleman, I have failed to find in his political action any other principles than those of the Vicar of Bray. I venture to think that those who sit on the Treasury Bench need not be afraid of the principles of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby with regard to remedies of Irish grievances. I think the time has come when an end should be put to the state of affairs that has existed, and I sincerely trust that the Government will set their faces completely against the policy of the past. Much has been said of the magnitude of the Irish Question. Now, it seems to me that the magnitude of a question in public or private life depends very much in the way in which it is treated. There are some people who, so to speak, are afraid of their own shadow; and, certainly, I think that one may look at a question too long, and thus become very liable to exaggerate its magnitude. I trust that Her Majesty's Government and the nation will look at this question in its true proportions. There is one point on which I agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. John Morley)—and I might say that he has almost taken the words out of my mouth. I think the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perhaps a little too hasty in using the word "equality." Now, I am of the opinion of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, that, however much we may wish it, we cannot deal with Ireland on an equality with Great Britain. We hope the time may come when we shall be able to do that; but it has not yet arrived. It is true that the Poor Law has not been administered as impartially as as some of us could wish; and I have heard it said that the Poor Law authorities have used their position for some purposes totally different from the objects of their office. Again, much ignorance exists amongst the people in Ireland, and while they remain so illiterate it is hardly likely that we can place them on the same footing as we are ourselves. Finally, I hope the Government will go forward with their policy and set us the example of doing what they think is right in this matter, even if they should be in a minority.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—put, and agreed to.

BEER ADULTERATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cuthbert Quilter, Bill for better securing the purity of beer, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cuthbert Quilter, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Lord Elcho, Mr. Gordon, Viscount Wolmer, and Mr. Francis Stevenson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 19.]

QUESTIONS.

MAURITIUS—THOMAS WILKINSON.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Supreme Court of Mauritius has annulled an order of expulsion against Thomas Wilkinson, made by Mr. Pickersgill, Vice Consul at Tananrive; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table any report of the proceedings in and judgment of the Supreme Court?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): I have not received any official information of the result of the action brought by Mr. Wilkinson; but from reports in the newspapers I gather that the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff with nominal damages and costs. I see no reason for putting the country to the expense of printing proceedings which do not seem to me to possess any public interest.

LAW OF TRADE MARKS—THE INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONVENTION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If Her Majesty's Government will introduce, as soon as practicable, a Bill to amend the Law of trade marks, and to provide against the false marking of goods sold in the United Kingdom, in accordance with the recommendations of the Master Cutler of Sheffield and other British delegates to the recent International Industrial Convention held at Rome?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have no intention of proposing any legislation of a general character during the present Session. Though at present I am unable to give any undertaking with regard to future legislation, I may state for the information of the hon. Member that the administration of the Trade Marks Acts, and the representations in favour of the amendment thereof which have been laid before the Board of Trade, are receiving, and will continue to receive, the careful consideration of the Department.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) observed that the Question did not refer to the administration of the law, but as to whether the Board of Trade would introduce the Merchandise Marks Bill of last Session?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he was unable to give any pledge as to the legislation of next Session, but could only repeat that the matter was receiving, and would continue to receive, the careful attention of the Board of Trade.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: In consequence of the answer of the hon. Gentleman, I shall repeat the Question on this day fortnight.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CONTEMPT OF COURT—THE CASE OF SARAH KEDART.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Sarah Kedart, who for eighteen months has been detained in Cardiff Gaol for contempt of court; whether he is aware that the plaintiff, her late husband, in the suit in which she was committed for contempt of court has since died; and, whether he will, considering the long duration of Sarah Kedart's imprisonment and her advanced age (seventy years), recommend Her Majesty to order her release?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) Birmingham, East, in reply, said, that Sarah Kedart had been attached for contempt in disobeying an order of the Queen's Bench Division, by which she was commanded to give up the deeds of a certain house. She had refused to comply with that order, and by reason of her contempt had been committed to prison. The Home Office could not interfere with orders of that sort. Application must be made to the Queen's Bench. The husband of Sarah Kedart was no party to the cause, and his death since her committal, though distressing, was not material to the case.

THE FISCAL LAWS—DUTIES ON IMPORTED MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SHIRLEY Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any changes in the fiscal laws of the country by placing duties on imported manufactures, by taxing foreign corn, by countervailing bounties, or in any other respect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): Yes, Sir; I am glad to be able to state for the information of the hon. Member that the Ways and Means for the year 1887-8, which the Government will propose to Parliament, will be communicated to the House on or about, I should think, the 31st of March next by the person, whoever he may be, who at the time happens to be Chancellor of the Exchequer.

LOCAL TAXATION—THE COUNTY RATE—CONTRIBUTIONS BY TOWNS HAVING SEPARATE QUARTER SESSIONS.

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS Birmingham, S. asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will institute the inquiry, proposed by the late Government, into the subject of the contributions to the County Rate now paid by towns having separate Quarter Sessions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) Birmingham, East, in reply, said, that the subject was one of very great complexity, and was deserving of inquiry. He could not undertake to issue the Commission suggested last year by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert); but he would undertake that in connection with Local Government the whole matter should be fully considered.

REGIMENTAL BANDS AT POLITICAL MEETINGS AND PUBLIC FESTIVALS.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that a band of the Royal Artillery at Woolwich played at a "Unionist Fête" at Walthamstow on 4th August; and, whether this was in accordance with the Rule prohibiting bands of regiments taking part in political demonstrations?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am informed that the application for the attendance of the band was for a garden party at the house of a gentleman who had obtained its services in the three previous years for purely private parties. Shortly, however, after his arrival, the bandmaster, seeing flags and other decorations which led him to suppose that the meeting might have some political character, after a short interval withdrew his band before any speeches were made, and the band therefore took no part in any political demonstration.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked whether the regulations forbidding the attendance of military bands at political gatherings applied to Yeomanry bands? He asked this question, because he saw that the band of the Shropshire Yeomanry contemplated playing at a dancing fête of the Primrose League.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, that he would make inquiry.

ADMIRALTY—DISCHARGE OF WORKMEN AT HAULBOWLINE.

Dr. TANNER Cork Co., Mid. asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is a fact that, since the 29th of last month, 50 men have been discharged from the new dock works at Haulbowline; how many years the present works have been in progress; at what date the works were first sanctioned; when, or about what time, is there any reasonable expectation of the works being completed; whether the principal dock is proportionately adequate for the reception of any of the first, second, or even third class ships of war in the Royal Navy; for what particular class of vessels are the docks intended; whether stone cutters are obliged to be employed to re-cut stones which failed to fit after being landed at Haulbowline; and if so, who is to blame; whether the boats in use for the purpose of conveying the shore labourers to and from the works would be seaworthy in tempestuous weather; whether four shipwrights, who have been employed in keeping these boats in good repair, have received notice of discharge; whether the skilled labour of shipwrights is necessary for securing the safety of the men working beneath at the river entrance to the docks; whether they have been constantly employed in making and repairing the waggons in daily use; and, whether, bearing in mind the great depression, the times, and the cheapness of labour, the Admiralty will advocate the re-employment of the men discharged, and the pressing forward of the works to completion?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT) (Sheffield, Ecclesall) (who replied) said: Only four men have been discharged since July 29 from the dock works at Haulbowline. The present works have been 21 years in progress, having been sanctioned in 1865. They will be completed in 1888. The dock is adequate for the reception of the ships intended—namely, first-class ships of the Royal Navy, including the Inferrible. The stone in stock is cut to meet alterations in plan, not defects in stone delivered, and no blame attaches to anyone. The boats are maintained in good order for the service required. Of four shipwrights under notice of discharge only one was employed on these boats. Shipwrights are not required for securing the safety of the men working at the river entrance. They have not been constantly employed in making or repairing waggons, but may have occasionally so worked. The works are being completed as fast as the annual grant will allow; but as they are drawing to a close there is no other course open but gradually to discharge the workmen when they are no longer required.

DR. TANNER asked if the discharge of the shipwrights was not constantly arising, and that they were men whose services were required to preserve the lives of the men engaged in the works?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, only one shipwright was required for the boats. If any complaint could be brought and substantiated he would take care that it was attended to.

DR. TANNER gave Notice that he should raise the question again upon the Estimates.

IRELAND—DUBLIN PORT—DUES ON FISHING BOATS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the "port dues" imposed by the Dublin Port and Docks Board on fishing boats from Arklow, Howth, Dungarvan, and other places on the coast of Ireland, can be diminished so as to allow the fishermen to dispose of their fish at a profit in Dublin?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth) (who replied) said: The application of the funds referred to by the hon. Baronet is at the disposal of the Dublin Port and Docks Board; and I have accordingly forwarded a copy of the Question to the Board for any observations they may have to make on the subject.

POOR LAW (IRELAND.—UNSANITARY CONDITION OF THE RATHDOWN UNION WORKHOUSE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If any steps can be taken to remedy the state of things caused by the defective drainage of the Rathdown Union Workhouse?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, the matter was one which concerned the Board of Guardians, and he understood their attention was now being directed to the subject. The Government could not interfere unless it was found absolutely necessary to do so.

ARMY — CHARGES AGAINST THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact, as stated in a letter written by Mr. Armit to the Under Secretary of State for War, dated 26th July last, and published in The Admiralty and Horse Guards Gazette of the 31st July, that certain officials connected with the Ordnance Department were, at the time of their connection with the Public Service, shareholders in a firm of contractors for the manufacture of ordnance; and, if such was the case, whether the Government have issued such instructions as will prevent the recurrence of such a state of affairs?

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Sir William Armstrong and Captain Andrew Noble, C.B., both directors and very large shareholders in "Armstrong, Mitchell, and Company," the Government Contractors for Ordnance, are or have been "associated" members of the Ordnance Committee on the Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the cause of the bursting of the 43-ton gun on board H.M.S. Collingwood; whether Sir Frederick Abel, the Chemist to the War Department, is not a member of the Ordnance Committee, and at the same time a shareholder to a considerable extent in the said "Armstrong, Mitchell, and Company;" and, whether General Sir Frederick Campbell, R.A., late Director of Artillery and Stores, was not at one time also a shareholder in "Armstrong, Mitchell, and Company," while holding an official appointment under Government?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE. Mr. W. H. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): In reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth Sir William Crossman, and also to that of the hon. and gallant Member for Rochester Colonel Hughes-Hallett, I have to state that Sir William Armstrong and Captain A. Noble, C.B., and also Mr. Gledhill, of Sir Joseph Whitworth and Co., have been associated with the Ordnance Committee for the special inquiry into the cause of the bursting of the gun on board Her Majesty's ship Collingwood, which was made at Woolwich. Sir William Armstrong and Captain Noble and Mr. Leece (of Sir Joseph Whitworth's firm) were requested in February, 1885, by the Secretary of State to act as associate members of the Ordnance Committee on the construction of ordnance. They are not ordinary members of the Ordnance Committee, and only sat on occasions when, by the direction of the Secretary of State, they were especially requested to do so. Sir Frederick Abel is not a regular member of the Ordnance Committee, but is associated therewith for inquiries connected with explosives. He was also associated with the Committee for the special inquiry above mentioned. He is, I am informed, a shareholder in Sir William Armstrong, Mitchell, and Co. As regards Sir Frederick Campbell, I have no information at hand which will enable me to state whether he was or was not a shareholder in the Company named at the time he was employed at the War Office; but, if necessary, I can inquire. I can only repeat what I said yesterday—that if any hon. Member or any other person in or out of this House has any charge whatever to bring against any member of the Ordnance Department, or any other officer serving in the War Office, I shall be glad to receive it, and I will undertake that it shall receive the due consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown. I again repeat that a tribunal competent to adjudicate upon it shall be found.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN: Allow me to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has not answered the latter part of my Question—namely, whether there are any regulations to prevent members connected with the Ordnance Committee from holding partnerships in firms having ordnance contracts?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I really am not able to say that any officer is not at liberty to invest his money in any Company he may think fit. But he is not at liberty to use any power which he possesses for his own personal advantage or for the advantage of any Company with which he is connected. I think the hon. and gallant Member will see that it would be utterly out of the power of any Secretary of State—and, indeed, he has no authority to do so—to lay down any regulations as to the investment of the private property of any officer serving the Crown.

INDIA—ANNUAL REMOVAL OF THE GOVERNMENT TO HILL STATIONS.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the great public meetings held at Calcutta, Lahore, and other places in India, to protest against the annual migration of Indian Governments to hill stations, and whether any action will be taken by the Government of India to meet the wishes of the people of India, both Native and European, on this subject; and, whether he is aware that a Return was ordered by this House on 30th July 1884, showing the cost of the annual migration, and whether that Return has ever been printed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN FORSTER) (Chatham): Her Majesty's Government have received no official information respecting the public meetings held at Calcutta and other places in India to protest against the annual migration of the Indian Governments to hill stations; nor have they received any intimation of the views and intentions of the Government of India relating thereto. I am aware that a Return, showing the cost of the annual migration, was ordered by the House of Commons on July 30, 1884. That Return was made on July 5, 1885; but the House has not yet ordered it to be printed.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE gave Notice that, in consequence of the answer given by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he should move that the Return in Question be printed.

IRELAND (SOUTH WEST DISTRICT)—SIR REDVERS BULLER.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What will be the official relation between General Sir Redvers Buller and the Inspector General; and, whether the powers of the Inspector General will be curtailed in consequence of General Buller's appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): There will be no curtailment of the powers of the Inspector General in consequence of Sir Redvers Buller's appointment. The relations between the Inspector General and Sir Redvers Buller will be, as I understand them, precisely the same as the relations which now exist between the Inspector General and Captain Plunket.

POST OFFICE—"CLERKS IN WAITING"—"TABLE MONEY."

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Postmaster General, If he will state the nature of the services in consideration of which it is proposed to pay an aggregate sum of £855 (besides "Table Money") during the present financial year in additional allowances to certain high-salaried officials of the Secretary's Department, for acting as "Clerks in Waiting;" and, what was the aggregate sum paid to these officers for "Table Money" during the last financial year?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member I have to inform him that it is necessary in the Post Office to have an experienced officer on duty each night and all through the night, and also throughout Sunday, to attend to any affairs of urgency or difficulty which may arise. This officer must be in a position to act for the Postmaster General and deal with all matters requiring special and immediate direction. Provision is made in the Estimates for this special duty. The authorized rate for "table money" is as stated in the Estimates, 10s. a day, which amounts to £182 10s. a year.

THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—TRUSTEES OF GOODFELLOW'S CHARITY, CO. DORSET.

MR. JESSE COLLINS (Birmingham, Bordesley) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he is aware that the Trustees of Goodfellow's Charity, in the parish of Fifehead, Neville, in the county of Dorset, are offering for sale the land belonging to the Charity; that the labourers of the parish have made application to the Trustees to rent this land, according to the provisions of "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882;" that the labourers have formally protested against the proposed sale, as a violation of the Act of 1882, which instructs the Trustees to offer the land for allotments; and, whether the Charity

Commissioners will request the Trustees to stop the sale until an inquiry has been made into the circumstances of the case?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir HENRY HOLLAND, Hampstead): It is true that the trustees have applied to the Commissioners for their sanction to the sale of five acres of land belonging to Goodfellow's Charity, and the Commissioners directed the publication of the usual notices for eliciting any objection to the sale. So far as the Commissioners are aware the labourers have not directly applied to the trustees, as a body, to rent the land in allotments. The Commissioners have received from the labourers several protests against the sale; but it is not asserted in any of them that the proposed sale is a violation of the Act of 1852. No order of the Board, without which the sale cannot proceed, will be made until the circumstances of the case have been further inquired into, and, if necessary, by an Inspector.

POST OFFICE — ACCELERATION OF THE SCOTCH MAILS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Postmaster General, If he intends to comply with the prayer of the various Memorials from Wick, Thurso, and the other towns in the North of Scotland for an acceleration of the down London day mail and the Scotch night mail, which now reaches Wick at 5 p.m., being only one hour and ten minutes before the arrival of the London night mail, although the day mail leaves London ten and a half hours before the night mail, thus wasting more than nine hours on the journey?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL, Mr. RAIKES (Cambridge University): Memorials have been recently received from Wick and other towns in the North of Scotland praying for an acceleration of the mail which now reaches Wick at 5 p.m., and the subject is now under inquiry. I cannot, of course, say until the reports are before me whether it will be possible to comply with the Memorials or not.

BULGARIA—RECENT REVOLUTION

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any further information as to the course of affairs in Bulgaria?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information, beyond that which has appeared in the public prints, which they can give the House regarding the recent events in Bulgaria?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government are not in possession of much more information than has been furnished by the newspapers. Direct communication with Sofia is at present interrupted. They have, however, a report despatched by the Acting Agent and Consul General stating that at 3 on Saturday morning a detachment of Infantry surrounded the Palace and secured the person of Prince Alexander, who is said to have signed an abdication. His Highness was taken to the War Office, and at 5 o'clock was conveyed under a guard to an unknown destination and a Provisional Government formed. Her Majesty's Government are watching the course of events in Bulgaria with very great anxiety. At present I think it best to confine my statement to facts of which we have authentic knowledge.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co. Mid) asked whether it was true that one of the Great Powers had been active in promoting the success of the policy undertaken in Bulgaria, and what steps Her Majesty's Government proposed to take in the matter?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: This Question was put into my hands as I entered the House, and I think I should be guilty of great levity if I gave any answer to it.

AFGHAN DEMARCATION COMMISSION.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any arrangement has been arrived at with the Russian Government for the discussion and settlement of the questions which remain to be determined regarding the frontier of Afghanistan?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have come to an arrangement with the Russian Government that the Commission, having completed the demarcation of the Afghan frontier as far as Dukchi, shall separate. As regards the remaining portion of the frontier, matters will remain in statu quo pending a settlement by the two Governments.

VENEZUELA—SEIZURE OF THE SHIPS
—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

Mr. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the expected Despatch from Venezuela, respecting the claims of British subjects arising out of the outrages committed on the crews and passengers of the ships Henrietta and Josephine, and the illegal seizure of those ships, has been received; whether the amount of the claim made on their behalf by the British representative in Venezuela was not, by his error, understated, and why such error was refused rectification; whether, and when, the papers promised by the late Under Secretary on the subject will be laid before Parliament; and, what is proposed to be done by the present Government to ensure justice being done to British subjects and British commerce in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Yes, Sir, that despatch has been received, and will be included in the Papers on the subject of Venezuelan claims which have already been laid upon the Table, and will be immediately distributed. I have learnt on inquiry that the claims on behalf of the crews and passengers of the Henrietta and Josephine were stated at a lower rate than that claimed by the persons concerned, after being assessed by the British Minister in Venezuela in communication with the Governor of Trinidad and the British Vice Consul at La Guaira; but any errors in the items of claim can be rectified when the time arrives for verifying and discussing them. The Venezuelan Government have declined to admit the validity of the claims, and a further communication is about to be made to them, which it is hoped may induce them to reconsider their decision.

BICYCLES.

Mr. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether

he can hold out any hope that Richmond Park will be opened for the use of cyclists, equally with persons using other vehicles, before the whole of the Summer has passed away?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I hope that within a few days cyclists will be admitted, equally with persons using other vehicles, into Richmond Park. New rules to that effect were completed on Saturday last, and so soon as they have obtained the signature of His Royal Highness the Ranger they shall be laid upon the Table of the House with as little delay as possible.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT—DISCHARGE OF A CLERK.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether a clerk in the Telegraph Department was recently discharged after five years' exemplary service, for the sole reason that he had not attained the height of five feet four inches?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that it is not the case that a clerk in the Telegraph Department has been dismissed after five years' service for the reason that he had not attained the height of 5 feet 4 inches. The facts are as follows:—The lad referred to was a telegraph boy messenger, and was not a member of the established staff. The regulations prescribe that these lads should cease to be boy messengers at the age of 19, when their service terminates. They are, however, eligible for nomination for the established situation of sorter or postman, for which, if they can pass the required standard of height—5 feet 4 inches—they have to obtain a Civil Service certificate. As the lad referred to was under the standard of height, he was ineligible for nomination. He might, if he had so elected, have become a candidate under the age of 18 for the situation of telegraphist, for which situation no standard of height is required.

ALLEGED DEPREDACTIONS BY A SPANISH MAN-OF-WAR.

Sir JOHN SIMON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any information had been received at the Colonial Office respecting the conduct of certain Spanish men-of-war off the coast of Jamaica in boarding vessels off British waters, and in one instance sending armed men on board a vessel taking in cargo within a hundred yards from the shore, and in another actually landing armed men at the port of St. Anne, under the pretext of searching for Cuban insurgents; and what steps are to be taken to prevent the recurrence of such gross breaches of International Law?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): The Governor of Jamaica has reported that the boats of a Spanish gunboat have boarded British vessels in British waters off the Northern Coast of Jamaica, and that the crews have occasionally landed on the Island with arms. The Governor had, on receiving this intelligence, informed the Spanish Consul at Kingston that such proceedings could not be permitted, and the captain of the Spanish gunboat had been similarly warned by the Commander of Her Majesty's ship Goshawk. The Spanish gunboat had left the North side of the Island and gone to Kingston, and the Governor did not anticipate any repetition of the acts complained of.

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MOTION FOR THE ADDRESS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Motion for the Address have precedence this day of the Notices of Motion, and To-morrow of the other Orders of the Day."—Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. PARNELL suggested that it would be more convenient to extend the Motion beyond to-morrow, or otherwise it might be necessary to repeat it on Friday or even next Tuesday if the debate on the Address was not then concluded. He should also like to know how Her Majesty's Government proposed to treat the Bill which the Attorney General for Ireland had given Notice he would introduce that evening. Was it intended to put it down for second reading to-morrow or the day after to-morrow? He thought it very likely that the second reading stage of the Bill would be opposed, and unless provision were made for the second reading the question would arise on Thursday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) Paddington, S.: I cannot contemplate at present any such contingency as the prolongation of the debate on the Address till next Tuesday. For all the present purposes of the House the Motion now made is adequate, as it is usual. With regard to the Bill referred to by the hon. Member, of course, if it is to meet with anything like protracted and stubborn opposition the Government will have to consider seriously whether it will be in their power to press it on the House at the present time; but if the opposition which the hon. Member seems to think might occur would be only for the purpose of raising a discussion on the principle or scope of the Bill, then, undoubtedly, the Government would endeavour to bring it on at an hour before the time after which opposed Business cannot be taken. Of course, the Bill will not be put down for second reading till it has been printed and circulated.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is his intention to move for leave to introduce his Bill for facilitating the proceedings of the Belfast Commission, and, if so, whether he will make a statement on his Motion of the provisions of the Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: Yes, Sir, it is my intention to make the Motion, and if it suits the convenience of the House I shall state the provisions of the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Motion for the second reading of the Bill be made after the debate on the Address?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Yes, certainly.

Motion agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th August.]—[See page 96.]

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Mr. Speaker, I am strongly disposed to demur—in fact, I think it is my duty to demur—to the inference which has been so freely drawn in this debate, and which has been alluded to in the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, as to the result of the recent Elections. I myself do not feel at all that the question of Irish self-government has been disposed of, much less finally disposed of, by the recent appeal to the country. In looking at the results of that appeal, I see that Her Majesty's present Government have been returned to power not as the Representative of the majority of the country, and certainly not as the Representatives of a majority of the House. I see that they are only in Office, and that they can only remain in Office on sufferance—on the sufferance of a certain number of Liberal Members of this House who call themselves Liberal Unionists; and only so long as that section of Members determine that the Irish Question—that the withholding of the right of self-government from Ireland—is more important to the interests of the Empire than all other English and Imperial questions put together. Now, Sir, I do not think that that time can last very long. Ireland is a very small and insignificant country. She has been able, of course, to give a great deal of trouble; but it cannot be pretended that the necessity of bullying and keeping down Irish national aspirations is of such importance as to require that the people of England, in their great domestic and Imperial concerns, should continue to be directed and governed by a Tory policy. In my judgment, the time will come, sooner or later, when the people of this country will signify, in no very doubtful fashion, to that section of the Liberal Party who are keeping the Tories in power and enabling the Tories to govern not only Ireland, but England and the Empire at large, that their patience has been exhausted, and that their desire that England should cease to be governed by the reactionary factions and the Tories, and that the great results of the extension of the franchise to the masses should be allowed to have their full play. As regards our own position, we have every reason to feel, I will not say satisfied with the result of the General Election, but certainly satisfied with our present position. For the first time in the history of the Irish national movement a large section, the great majority, of the Liberal Party have declared at the polls that Ireland is entitled to autonomy. That declaration has been endorsed in the country by the great majority of the Liberal electors—the vast majority. If I look at the Election Returns, I find that the Conservative Party were in no instances helped by anything but an insignificant section of the Liberal voters in the constituencies. I find, on the other hand, that where the Tories gained seats, it was due to hesitation on the part of a considerable section of the Liberal electorate. I am not surprised that they should have shown this hesitation, in view of the extraordinary attempts made to deceive them, and to raise false issues; and in view of the great weight which was lent to such false issues by such men as the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), and the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for another Division of Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). I am not in the least surprised that there was sufficient hesitancy on the part of a section of the Liberal Party, so as to enable the Tory Gentlemen opposite to take their seats on the Treasury Bench; but I do not think that if the Elections were to take place now, you would see such a result. I do not believe that if even three weeks' more time had been given for fuller examination of this question, the Tory Party would have been able to profit by that hesitation. Certainly, after the present Government have exhibited themselves as a spectacle for gods and men for a year or two, in their attempt to govern Ireland, I am convinced that there will be no such hesitation, so that we have every reason to be patient. We have every reason, as the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, the senior Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley), said the other evening, to be moderate, and to urge on our people at home to be moderate, and to keep them within the limits of loyalty, as far as any advice of ours can possibly so keep them, because ours is a winning cause. It can only be damaged by excesses of any kind; and if the speeches which have been made from the Treasury Bench and in "another place" within the last day or two have been intended to exasperate Ireland, then I believe they will very seriously fall short of their effect. At the same time, I am bound to say that there must be considerable difficulty in that country in the coming winter on the question of rent; and I seriously regret that the Government have not appeared to estimate, at its full gravity, the position in Ireland with regard to this matter. They talk of issuing a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring into the question. But such a Commission cannot possibly report until the winter has gone over, and it is in the winter when the pinch must arise. I shall refer more fully to this branch of the question a little later on; but I would wish to say that the Government, although they have put forward a Speech from the Throne of a non-committal character, have not followed up that Speech in their explanations to both Houses of Parliament. On the contrary, they have foreshadowed—all the principal speakers who have addressed Parliament on the part of the Government have foreshadowed—very extensive changes in the law of the land. In addition to announcing a policy of what they call firm administration of the law in Ireland, they have also announced, and they have very boldly foreshadowed, very extensive changes in the law of the land. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), and, last night, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), have all, in the most unhesitating and unqualified manner, announced that the policy of the Government with regard to the land in Ireland will be to substitute for the dual ownership established by the Land Act of 1881 a system of single ownership by the occupying tenants. Now, Sir, that is a policy which cannot be carried out except with the expenditure of a vast sum of money. I have made my estimate in times past as to what would be a reasonable sum to spend on a settlement of the Land Question by purchase, and I put it at £100,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), I think, placed it at £150,000,000. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: £113,000,000.] £113,000,000! But the leading Members of the Conservative Party, in their speeches in the country last year, placed it at £250,000,000. And if there is to be this radical alteration in the settlement attempted to be made by the Land Act of 1881, if—in the words of Lord Salisbury, of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—the system of dual ownership in Ireland is to be replaced by one of single ownership, it can only be replaced, and, certainly, it can only be replaced under a Tory Government, by the expenditure of very vast sums of money at the risk or expense of the English taxpayer. My position has always been a perfectly clear one in respect to this matter. Perhaps I shall be told that I agreed to the Land Purchase Act of 1885; but I did not agree to it with coercion in prospect. I agreed to it because I believed that a settlement of the National Question was about to come concurrently with a settlement of the Land Question. I agreed to it because the Government of which the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and Lord Salisbury, were Members, had sent over to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant an avowed Home Ruler, whom they knew to be an avowed Home Ruler, whom they knew to be in favour of a separate Constitution for Ireland. ["Order, order!"]

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I rise to Order. I cannot allow it to be stated—["Order, order!"]—by any hon. Gentleman—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: It is not a question of Order. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork is in possession of the House, and the right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of making any correction afterwards.

MR. PARNELL: Well, Sir, if Lord Salisbury did not know that Lord Carnarvon was a Home Ruler, I wonder why he took such pains in the beginning of last July to tell Lord Carnarvon, on his acceptance of Office, that he had not yet arrived at the belief that Home Rule was possible for Ireland. And I wonder why Lord Salisbury was not able to say that he had ever expressed an opinion adverse to Home Rule to Lord Carnarvon after that time. I also wonder why Lord Salisbury, in his celebrated Newport speech, made pointed references to the settlement which had taken place between Austria and Hungary as a settlement which he feared might not be possible in Ireland, but which he hoped would be. At all events, that, Sir, was my main reason for supporting the Land Purchase Act of 1885. Circumstances are now, however, entirely changed. We have not Lord Carnarvon as Lord Lieutenant any longer. Why have we not Lord Carnarvon as Lord Lieutenant any longer? It is true, Sir, we have a Home Secretary who, in 1870, contributed £30 to the funds of the predecessor of the Irish National League—the Home Rule League—one of the principles of which Body was that no power except that of the Queen, Lords, and Commons of Ireland had any right to make laws for that country. Sir, I am very sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not changed his colours with his position, and that some day or other we shall have from him a bold, able, and eloquent justification of his real belief in the position which he then took. I sincerely hope we shall. But, Sir, to return to the Land Question. I would wish to say that the settlement of the question of the purchase of land in Ireland, concurrently with that of the national question proposed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, would have been a safer one for the British taxpayer under the limitations and restrictions which were attached to it. Under those limitations and restrictions the Imperial authority would not have been obliged to come into contact in the process of the collection of rent with a single tenant. Every penny of the principal and interest required for the £50,000,000 would have been paid out of the Customs and Excise, which were all absolutely under the control of the Imperial authority, who would not in the collection of the money, which is as safe as the Bank of England, ever come in contact with a single labourer or tenant in Ireland. But what is the position taken up by the present Government? They contend that it is not quite safe to buy the congested estates in the West of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant tells us that he hopes in the future to establish a system by which Local Authorities in Ireland—to be also established hereafter—will be able to give county guarantees in order to protect the State from the risk of buying these rotten estates in the West of Ireland. That is a very kind offer indeed of the right hon. Gentleman to make to us. First, that he is going to establish Local Authorities who will be constituted in such a way as to be foolish enough to become guarantors for the purchase of these rotten estates, upon which there are, according to the letters of Sir James Caird, 528,000 tenants absolutely unable to pay any economical rent at all; and, secondly, that these estates are to be purchased. Well, Sir, if his local government is going to be in that shape, I should say that the less local government we have from the right hon. Gentleman the better. If he succeeds in establishing Boards in Ireland which, by a liberal infusion of the ex officio or landlord element, will be in a position to put taxes upon these impoverished counties in the West, the result will be no safer to the Imperial Exchequer than if he had not established these County Authorities, and nothing bearing a good effect will have been done at all. Sir, the Western counties in which these congested estates are situated are as poor as the estates themselves. The poor rates are often excessively high there, in many cases as much as 5s. in the £ of the total valuation. At times of exceptional pressure and distress they frequently run up to 10s., and in the time of famine they went up to 20s. in the £. This, Sir, is the property which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to lay his hands on, under the guise of local government, and of securing, by a county guarantee, the Imperial Exchequer against loans for purchasing congested estates, a plan which would be absolutely valueless in the times of pressure which annually occur in Ireland. That is a portion of the policy of the Government. But another policy would be to purchase other estates not so valueless, and not in such congested districts. This is in action now under the Act of 1885, and I have seen some details of purchase which certainly make me believe that the transaction will not be a safe one for the Imperial Exchequer. Under that Act the landlord is entitled to guarantee one-fifth of the purchase money by allowing it to remain as a sort of security. The practice on the part of those representing the landlords, in some recent sales, I am informed, has been to say to the tenant—"If you offer to give a higher price than you think the land is really worth to the extent of that one-fifth, we will never call upon you to pay that one-fifth; we will allow you to repudiate that one-fifth." Is that a very safe way of commencing to deal with the tenantry, even on the most solvent of estates, leaving alone those in the congested districts? Should you commence by telling them almost absolutely to repudiate one-fifth of the purchase money? Sir, this idea of repudiation will become instilled into the mind of the tenantry—it will take root and extend beyond that one-fifth. I wish to clear my hands entirely of any responsibility in reference to the working of the Land Purchase Act of 1885, or any loss which may arise to the Imperial Exchequer hereafter, any loss which may arise from the proposed gigantic schemes of Land Purchase which the Government have foreshadowed, by saying that, in my opinion, in present circumstances the prices likely to be given by the tenants, under the pressure of what is called the stern enforcement of the law—perhaps, almost certainly, under the pressure of an additional Coercion Act next year—will have such an effect as to render it an exceedingly dangerous thing for the State to entertain the matter at all. What was suggested, Sir, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in my opinion, would in Ireland have been met with the united efforts of the people to pay the amount to the last penny. And, Sir, if the question of the settlement of the land is divorced from the National Question—if Sir, it is intended to alienate national feeling, it will be found that the Government will have got hold of a very thorny stick by the wrong end. I have myself, Sir, always desired a fair consideration of public money advances for Irish objects; because I believe that if the Land Question were once settled, the way would be made easier for the settlement of the national question of self-government; but I should certainly be most dishonest if, out of any desire to see the Land Question settled, I were to join in the designs which the Government appear to have upon the pockets of the British taxpayers when they announce, as has been done by Lord Salisbury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the judicial rents are sacred; that if they are too high they must be reduced, not at the loss of the landlords, but the loss of the Imperial Exchequer. No, Sir; the honest policy is, that the land should pay as much as it can pay in fairness—that is, what it pays in England. The English landlords reduce their rents when a crisis such as that in Ireland comes upon them; they voluntarily reduce the rents 30 or 40 per cent. The land, in many cases, is thrown out of cultivation for want of tenants. The English landlords, Sir, do not come to the State and beg it to advance fabulous and gigantic sums, for the purpose of enabling them to keep up to the high level of judicial or any other rent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was put up manifestly to smooth and explain away the too candidly open utterances of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It appears to me, Sir, however, that he has succeeded in making the position of the Government worse; because, whilst he admitted that the question of rents that were not judicial rents should be a fair subject of negotiation between the landlords and tenants with a view to their reduction, he said the judicial rents could not be made the subject of any arrangement or reduction.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): No; I did not say that.

MR. PARNELL: I do not know, then, what the meaning is of the extract which I shall read from the right hon. Gentleman's speech last night. If it be not that, I am afraid it has no meaning at all. He says—

"There would be no difficulty in doing this in Ireland as in England; no difficulty in the cases where the tenants may find it impossible to pay their rents in the coming autumn, if landlords and tenants were free to make their own bargains for themselves. The Act of 1881 contained a provision meeting cases where the tenant whose rent has not been fixed by the Court may apply to have eviction stayed until the Court has adjudicated, and I know no reason why the Court should not act with perfect fairness in such a matter. Now, I come to another matter—the question of tenants holding under judicial rents. My noble Friend has already put before the House the position of this question. Under the Act of 1881 Commissioners were appointed; and can it be supposed that these Commissioners, who were considered amply qualified by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, fixed the judicial rents without taking into consideration the fact that the price of produce must necessarily vary? But was this a temporary or a permanent matter? We find the tenants, as I have already stated in reply to a Question, can afford to give enormous sums for the tenant right. These are matters which surely deserve grave consideration, especially by those who are responsible for the Land Act of 1881, before they undertake to say that the judicial rents were fixed so unfairly that when a fall in prices comes those rents must be revised. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government have never, from the beginning of this matter, looked upon the Commissioners who have decided rents as infallible, either in their methods or in their knowledge of the question. We admit that it is possible that they may have been a good deal wrong; and, therefore, we include this matter in the inquiry which we propose. It is not for me to forecast what the result of that inquiry may be on either of the two points affecting the payment of rents specified for inquiry in that Commission."

Therefore, according to the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the distinction is that the rent which is not a judicial rent may be settled between the landlord and tenant as it would be in England; but all questions affecting rents that have been judicially fixed must wait until the Commissioners have completed their inquiry. That, Sir, I consider to be a fair representation of the right hon. Gentleman's utterances. What will be the consequence? That is hard to say; but it is certain that the tenants who have relied upon this House and upon the efficacy of the Act of 1881 to put them in a secure position will be punished by the right hon. Gentleman because they have relied upon that measure, because they have applied to the Courts to fix their rents. Now that a great fall in prices has taken place, they are to be debarred from any relief, at all events before the Commission has sat and inquired, and afterwards they are not to be relieved by the lowering of the rents, but at the expense of the Imperial taxpayers. But what, Sir, about the tenants who remained out of Court in 1881, in obedience to the "No Rent" Manifesto, the tenants who have been fighting their way outside the Courts? Why, they are to be taken under the wing of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and are to be told that it is quite right and proper for them to bargain with their landlords, as tenants in England do, in order to obtain a reduction. If that is the way in which the Chief Secretary is going to teach the Irish tenant farmers and people to rely on the law of the land and the justice of this House he is on the wrong tack. Now, I want to say a few words about the appointment of General Buller. I would like to know if the Government intend that that officer should administer the civil or military power? Is he to have control of the magistracy? The Stipendiary Magistrates are gentlemen who have passed through a special study and training. They are acquainted with the law in Ireland; they know familiarly what the Civil Law is; and they have spent many years in acquiring their broad experience. Is General Buller to be given any opportunity of making himself acquainted with the law of the country which he is to administer? What has been his experience in the past? Has he ever administered the Civil Law in any country where that law existed? I never heard that he had. I rather think that his experience is confined to the administration of Military Law in savage countries where no law had ever existed, or where it had been superseded by that martial law which is the abolition of all law. Inter arma silent leges, and I suppose we shall be told that General Buller will be entitled to manufacture in Kerry a code of his own adapted to the situation. Has he any knowledge of the Civil and Criminal Law of Ireland, of the duties of the Constabulary, of the duties of the Resident and ordinary Magistrates? I do not wish to say a single word against the great gallantry and the military ability of this officer; but I cannot but think that the Kerry "Moonlighters" will think themselves highly complimented at having among them to effect their subjection so gallant a General, backed, as I suppose he will be, by a very considerable portion of the British Army. But I think we ought to know what is going to happen, and what he is going to do. Is he going to strain the Civil Law, or is he going beyond it; and, if so, do you intend to apply to Parliament for Acts of indemnity for such excess as was done in the Rebellion of 1798? That course was followed at that time; but even in Kerry things are not so bad as they were then. The Government have in their service many civil officers from among whom they might have chosen one for this special duty. They might, for instance, have recalled Mr. Clifford Lloyd from his Colonial post, where it is reported he is not getting on very well with his superior. But why poor General Buller should be selected, and be sent over to Kerry for the purpose of attempting to catch "Moonlighters," that is a thing beyond my comprehension. But I suppose that the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his desire to introduce a new policy, desired also to do something startling. He has told us that he entirely disagrees with what he terms the traditional policy of the Liberal Party—namely, that the redress of grievances and the maintenance of social order are closely and intimately connected. But although he has told us that, he has rather shown his firm belief in the truth of that connection by appointing a Commission which is to inquire both into the question of social order and the question of agrarian legislation with regard to redress of grievances. The Commission is appointed to inquire into any combination which may exist to resist the enforcement of legal obligations, and also the fall in the price of produce. It is also to inquire to what extent there exists any general desire among the tenants to avail themselves of the provisions of the Land Purchase Act of 1885—that is to say, it is to inquire into the question of social order, and also to inquire into the question of agrarian legislation—two questions which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has always contended are intimately connected, and which the experience of the history of all countries has shown to be intimately connected, but which the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer denies there is any connection between whatever. Now, Sir, I want to ask the Government, with regard to the Royal Commission, as to its constitution. I wish to ask how soon they intend to inform the House as to the Members of which it is to be composed? Something may depend upon the constitution of this Commission; at all events, the matter appears to have been under the consideration of the Government for some time, and they surely will be in a position to inform the House now as to the constitution of such an important Body. I shall be glad to know if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is going to be a Member of it. The right hon. Gentleman was going to pay a visit to Ireland a year ago in another fashion—he was going to inquire, for his own information, in regard to the merits of the Irish Question. It will be very interesting for the right hon. Gentleman to go over to Ireland and complete the inquiry, which was shortened before by the ill-advised threat of Mr. Healy that they might duck him in a horse pond. He will have an opportunity now of going over under different auspices, and under the protection of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and he will not have the slightest risk of any such fate as that foreshadowed by Mr. Healy under the changed conditions. I should also like to know whether they think it right that Members of the Nationalist Party should serve on this Commission? It was announced that due regard would be had to the due representation on the Commission of all Parties and sections in Ireland; and I wish to know whether the National Party will have a representation to the extent of five-sixths of its number? I do not see in what other way you are to carry out the pledge made the other night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect to this matter. But we are not only to have a Commission charged with the duty of inquiring into the Land Question, and we are not only to incur, in all probability, a vast future expenditure in connection with that question, under circumstances which yield but little hope of its ever being repaid—we are also to have a Commission appointed to consider the subjects of railways, tramways, roads, harbours, and the industrial resources of the country generally. You therefore contemplate committing the dishonesty of attempting to bolster up the system of landlord and tenant in Ireland by the expenditure of vast sums of public money, the repayment of which is quite uncertain and highly problematic; you propose to commit the folly of spending large sums of money in building harbours of refuge on the West Coast for fishing boats that do not exist; you propose to commit the folly of lowering the bed of the great arterial lines of drainage—the Shannon, the Suck, and the Barrow—at a cost of £750,000, when, according to the Report of the Committee which has already sat upon the subject, and the estimates of the chief engineer to the Board of Works in Dublin, the lowering of the bed of the River Suck alone would cost £650,000, and when the whole work must really involve an expenditure of fully £10,000,000. You propose, also, to commit the dishonesty of endeavouring to stimulate Irish manufactures by liberal doses of English public money. I believe, Sir, that the Irish people utterly refuse to sell their national birthright for a mess of pottage. I dare say the expenditure of the money will be very gratifying to many people—to people who live upon jobs. They will be very much pleased. I wonder why we have not heard of a project for cutting a tunnel through the Whinstone Rock, between Scotland and the North of Ireland, or making a ship canal through the Bog of Allen to Galway. However, I suppose the five harbours of refuge are sufficient for the present. But after you have spent all this English public money you purpose, you will have the satisfaction of finding that at least three-fourths of it will be absolutely wasted, and that you will not be thanked for your expenditure of the other fourth. You have not in Ireland, at the present moment, a single competent engineer in the Department. The Irish Board of Works has strewn the coasts with monuments of its ignorance and incompetence as an engineering body. I have myself some little knowledge of this question of the development of the industrial resources of Ireland, and I believe that the more State money there is given to such a purpose the less satisfactory will the result be. The best and only way to develop the industrial resources of Ireland is to allow the Irish people to do all these works themselves; and I think, having done them themselves, they should be allowed to have a right to the profit. This question of the influx of capital into Ireland, although we hear so much as to the necessity of it, is entirely beside the question. We do not want an influx of capital; we have got plenty of it of our own. What we want is to be allowed to keep the capital we have got in the country. At present, all the Irish capital comes over to England. There is scarcely an Irish bank that does not place five-sixths of its capital in this country. What we want is to be allowed to help ourselves. [Laughter.] Self-help according to Mr. Smiles, is one of the greatest of your national virtues, and I am surprised to hear English Gentlemen deride the idea. Certainly, no nation in the world is so conspicuous an example of the successful results arising out of self-help as the English nation. You have been allowed to help yourselves; you have been allowed to devote your own energies under your system of self-government in this House to the development of your own resources; but if you had some Pasha over in Constantinople, deciding what canals you should have cut, and what swamps should be drained, what sea lands should be reclaimed, what harbours of refuge established, you would have found the results less satisfactory, and you would probably have been in a worse condition with regard to these matters than you are to-day. These five harbours of refuge which are to be established on the West Coast, when they have been built at a vast cost—for I take it they will be constructed to admit vessels of large tonnage—will be found perfectly useless for fishing smacks. Everybody knows that fishing smacks require small harbours at small intervals. Fishermen do not require these gigantic harbours. They require harbours near their fishing grounds, and it is no advantage to them to have these large harbours 50 or 60 miles away. Such harbours of refuge, so far as the advantage of the fishing on the West Coast of Ireland is concerned, would be of very little advantage. The fishermen would require to be within easy access of the fishing ground, and to be able to run to a port near at hand. However, this is another example of the largeness of mind and breadth of view of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We are to be treated to an entirely new policy from top to bottom, and if the poor British taxpayers suffer it cannot be helped but we have liberated our souls—we have declared we shall be no party to this fraud. It will be for Her Majesty's Government, having got into Office by misrepresentations—I will not add by wholesale lying—to continue their policy by establishing a vast system of corruption and bribery in Ireland, not by means of money taken out of their own pockets or of the candidates, but out of those of the unfortunate Imperial taxpayer. Now, Sir, I will turn to my Amendment; it has reference to the question of social order in Ireland and to the Land Question. My Amendment draws attention to the fact that there has been a very serious fall in the price of agricultural produce in Ireland; that this fall has taken place since the bulk of the judicial rents were fixed; that the Irish tenants, as a body, will experience considerable difficulty in the payment of their rents, and that many of them will be unable to pay these rents at all; that the rights which were given and guaranteed by the State to the Irish tenants under the Act of 1881 are likely to be confiscated, owing to the evictions of tenants; and that these evictions, if carried out, will cause wide-spread suffering and endanger the maintenance of social order. Further, Sir, I deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise in consequence of the inability of the tenant to pay the present rents from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they are now. Now, Sir, let me say a word as to the question of these judicial rents, and the difficulty in all cases, and the inability in many cases, of the tenants to pay them. It involves an admission to some extent that the rents are too high, at all events in the present season. Why are these rents too high? They are too high for several reasons. In the first place, they are too high because the House of Lords mutilated the Land Act of 1881, and destroyed, or nearly destroyed, all the value which existed in the Improvement Clauses of that Act. The rest of the value of these clauses, left by the House of Lords, was destroyed by the decision of the Supreme Court in Dublin in the celebrated case of "Adams v. Dunseath," where the majority of the Appeal Judges, being Tories, on a very narrow division carried judgment in favour of the landlord, and against the tenant. The Lord Chancellor, who piloted the Bill through this House, was one of the Judges, and voted in its favour. The decision of "Adams v. Dunseath" deprived the Improvement Clauses of the Land Act of any value that they had. The third reason why the Act of 1881 fixed rents too high was the weakness of the Land Commission, or rather the weakness of the portion of it which was supposed to be friendly to the tenant. There was a certain number of the Commissioners who were supposed to be friendly to the landlord, and a certain number who were friendly to the tenant. Judge O'Hagan and Mr. Litton, who were the friends of the tenants, allowed themselves to be browbeaten by the clamours of the Orange newspapers in Ireland and by their Colleagues to such an extent that the tenants lost all confidence in the fair administration of the Land Act of 1881. I think those three causes very clearly describe the reason why the rents fixed by that Act were too high, and have not given satisfaction. I regret very much that an opportunity was not taken to settle the Land Question under the principle of the Land Act. I fear that the opportunity may not come again so soon; that there may be much trouble, much distress, and some crime caused by the relations between landlord and tenant before the work that was commenced by the Land Act of 1881 is taken up again. But we have to deal with things as they stand, and we find that the rents fixed, owing to these three causes, are too high to allow the tenants to live and thrive. What is to be done? We cannot, in the present Session of Parliament, go into a revision of the Act of 1881, and I do not propose that in my demand. But the Government, even if they are unwilling to do anything, might at least have refrained from inciting the landlords to wholesale evictions. ["No, no!"] The language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Salisbury, although somewhat modified by the language of the Chief Secretary for Ireland last night, gave the keynote for it. It can have no other effect. Evictions and outrage or agrarian crime in Ireland have always followed in each other's footsteps very closely; and if hon. Members will examine the statistics of eviction and outrage they will find that there is a very close correspondence in the relative numbers. They will find, for instance that in the county of Kerry, where there is so much complaint made, and justly made, of agrarian crime of a very terrible character, evictions are nearly as numerous as the whole of Munster put together, and the agrarian crime is in the same proportion. If they trace the thing they will find that in the counties where there are few evictions agrarian crime is almost unknown. You cannot deal with Ireland as though it were a country where agrarian crime is universal; because according to the admission of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, agrarian crime is confined to Kerry and one or two districts in the South and West of Ireland, and it is in these districts you will invariably find that evictions have been pressed to their utmost. What is the belief of the people of Kerry with regard to this "Moonlighting?" Why do they refuse to give evidence? Why do they refuse to identify the men who come to their doors and batter them down, and take away arms, fire shots, and, in some cases, take money? If you ask the people you will find that it is from a universal belief that were it not for "Moonlighting" Lord Kenmare would not leave the roof over any of his tenants. That is not a justification of "Moonlighting;" but it is one of the causes of "Moonlighting." I do not wish to say that "Moonlighters" are entirely governed by considerations of the agrarian question; but it is the belief of the people that they are largely governed by those considerations, and that the "Moonlighters" constitute a protection for them against the rapacity of the landlord. They are, therefore, willing to allow them to levy black mail. This has often happened in other countries where the Constitution has been suspended or withheld. It happened in the Southern States of America after the suppression of the rebellion. The Federal Government refused to restore the Constitution to the States that rebelled. They said that they were not fitted for self-government, and that they would be a danger to the Union if their Constitution was restored; they said, in effect, what the Liberal Unionists and the Members of the Government were saying up and down the country during the General Election; and on this pretext they suspended the Constitution of the Southern States, and gave them a somewhat similar Government to that which you have in Ireland. They had what is known as a "carpet-bagging Government." They sent people from the North who had no connection with the country, and who, coming with a very small amount of goods, got the name of "carpet-baggers." Well, one consequence of that was that a secret conspiracy strikingly resembling, in many of its features, the different secret conspiracies which have existed from time to time in Ireland—the old Whiteboy conspiracy and the present "Moonlighting" conspiracy—arose in the Southern States and several of the other States, and practically administered the law of the land. The Federal authorities were unable to afford any protection to the classes who are represented by the landlords in Ireland. I do not mean that the negroes of the Southern States are anything like the landlords of Ireland; because they, the negroes, are a hard-working lot of men, do all the work of the country, and were unable to obtain protection, as were also the Whites who belong to the Republican Party. The Government tried their very best to keep order in the country—they suspended the Constitution for several years; but until they gave back their Constitution to the Southern States they were not able to restore law and order, and to put an end to the Ku Klux. This was the case with Ireland. No statesman, until the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, had been wise enough to see that law and order could not be maintained in Ireland without coercion, except by the Representatives of her own people. The right hon. Gentleman introduced his Bill, and it was defeated in this House, and afterwards defeated in the country, and the present Government are now left to face the problem of maintaining law in Ireland. They say that they are going to do it without coercion—I do not believe they will do any such thing. I think it will be necessary for the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to urge their fires, to sharpen their pincers, and prepare their scorpion whips. They will find that the Irish people will never submit to be governed by a Government which is not their own. They will be patient, I have no doubt—they will have abundance of patience. But the incitements which have been addressed to the Irish landlords to evict their judicial tenants, the tenants under the protection of judicial leases, by wholesale, for the non-payment of an impossible rent, will bear fruit. Evictions will take place, and exasperation will follow; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant will find that it will be impossible for him to collect rents which do not exist, and the landlords will cry out to him for coercion, and will force him to bring forward a measure of coercion. It is not a very pleasant prospect to look forward to—it is not a very pleasant prospect for us. I had hoped and had believed that this question between the two countries might have been settled peacefully with the consent and in the interests of both. That is not to be, at all events for the present. I shudder to think that the state of Ireland may not be so good in three or four months as it is now. Undoubtedly, the distraction of the attention of the people of England to a policy of coercion in Ireland will damage the national prospects and the prospects of Irish autonomy completely. I would do much—I would willingly do anything—to avoid coercion; but things have gone against us, and we are powerless. We see what is coming, and we believe that it will be coercion, and that very soon it will be coercion which will not stop at criminals, which will not be content with taking, or seeking to take, the breakers of the law, but it will be coercion directed against your political opponents in Ireland. It will be directed against the expression of their opinions, publicly or privately, in Ireland, against freedom of speech in the country, against the right of public meeting, against the freedom of the Press. No English Minister hitherto who has administered a Coercion Law has discriminated between political opponents and criminal opponents—he has bundled them together into one; he has shut his eyes and struck at whoever came in his way. That has been our experience in the past, and we do not suppose that the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary are better or more discriminating—however less discriminating—now than their Predecessors have been. We should have wished that some peace would be given—that there should be some truce in this agrarian war. We had hoped that the Government would say, as Lord Carnarvon said this time last year, that he hoped the landlords would exercise their rights with leniency, and give time to the tenants to pay the rents, which they have not. But we have heard nothing of the kind. We have not now a Government which is dependent upon the Irish vote. We have now a Government with which they think they can sail along for a while without us. I do not wish to prophesy, but from my study of the history of the past few years I believe that no system of coercion will be effectual in Ireland. Even though England should accompany it with the suspension of the Constitution, of the rights of Ireland both in this House and out of it, you will not succeed. You must administer your Coercion Bills as Russia does. Then that will be coercion worthy of the name; but to keep up a pretended Constitutional system in Ireland, and to allow 85 Irish Members to come into this House and expose the working of your coercion, that will not be a successful system. You will find that out sooner or later. You may put down liberty of speech in Ireland; you may put down the right of public meeting; and having imprisoned as many of your political opponents without trial as you can lay your hands upon, you will have to come over here and carry the war into the House of Commons, and terminate the sham Constitutional system of representation which you offered to Ireland at the Union. And now Ireland has turned it into a reality, and used it for her own good, you will find it to be intolerable. If I were to offer a suggestion—and I suppose I ought to offer a suggestion—as to what should be done in Ireland now, I would venture to say this. The judicial tenancies were fixed for 15 years. At the time they were fixed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in doubt as to whether the period should be 15 years, or a shorter period of five years. We declined to take any responsibility upon ourselves with reference to the matter, and the term was fixed for 15 years. In the Scotch Act it was fixed at seven years. I would take even a shorter period, and would fix the period for a revision of the rents at three years according to the prices, and I would admit the leaseholders to the benefit of the Land Act, a proposition which has been named by a Member on each side of the House, the Members for North Armagh and South Tyrone respectively. I would make the term shorter. I would make it three years, and decide what reduction should be given according to the fall of prices. In the case of judicial rents, it could be fixed by a man in an office at Dublin, and without the necessity of sending all over the country. I do not advance this as a settlement of the Irish Land Question; but I advance it as a very pressing necessity for the present winter, and I think if you adopted these two suggestions, and gave some such powers to a Court as are given under the Land Act, to discriminate as to evictions, where the tenant lodges two-thirds of the money into Court, you would relieve the pressure very materially. These are my suggestions, and I offer them humbly with a sincere desire to benefit Ireland; and I should hope that if they or any of them are adopted they would be accompanied by some announcement on the part of the Government similar to that made by Lord Carnarvon this time last year, that they hoped the landlords would remember that they have their duties as well as their rights. This is a time of very serious and sore pressure—a time upon which very much may turn. It surely cannot be the desire of the Government to enter into a deliberate conflict with the tenantry of Ireland, to exterminate them by many thousands. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not see any other result if they proceed on the lines of the declarations we have heard from the responsible officials of the Government. However it may be, I am confident that whether the Government go on in the course which they have chosen, and whether they recognize the pressure which is upon the agricultural community in Ireland, the National Question, the question of autonomy for Ireland, now that it has been raised, will be always first in the hearts of the Irish people. The large Liberal majority—the vast majority of the Liberal Party, who have voted for the solution at the General Election, will vote for it again, and their ranks will then be replenished by those doubters whose hesitancy lost the battle on this occasion, and whose conversion will gain it for us at the next. I beg to move as an Amendment to the Address the words which stand in my name.

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words,—“And humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fear that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing widespread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I am exceedingly reluctant to stand, even for a short time, between the House and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone); but as the speech which has been delivered, if it was spoken in support of any case, was spoken in support of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, I am sure he will not think I am exceeding the limits of courtesy if, for a short time, I intervene in the debate. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell), in the very remarkable speech he delivered, commenced by demurring to the inference which he said was drawn from recent events, that the question of Home Rule was disposed of. He said that if there were a General Election now to take place a very different result would follow. Well, I am bound to say that I cannot trace any signs of the times, so far, at all events, that go to support that supposition. What I know is that within the walls of this House we had last night a very signal instance of the accord which subsists between hon. Members on both sides of this House who are linked together for the purpose of maintaining the integrity of the Union of the Parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland; and outside this House, at every election that has hitherto taken place, at every opportunity there has been of testing public opinion, the majorities obtained by candidates supporting the Government have, in every instance, been increased. The hon. Gentleman went on to say something about General Sir Redvers Buller, on which I cannot enter. For, as the hon. Member is very well aware, he having moved an Amendment to the Address, every speaker who follows him must confine himself to the terms of that Amendment. However, I suppose it is not outside the limits of that Rule to refer to the question which he has put to the Government. He has asked us how soon we are going to inform the House of the composition of the Commission which is to be issued? Surely this is a novel course for the hon. Member to adopt! after having, by his supporters in this House, for the last three nights, by every means in his power, thrown ridicule and discredit on the proposal to issue that Commission, having himself, in his own speech, done all he can to damage whatever beneficial effects it might have, he seems to make it a grievance—or a request—that he and his Friends should take part in the proceedings of that Commission. It is really a very difficult thing to follow the particular line of argument which the hon. Member has adopted this evening.

Mr. PARNELL (Cork): I did not ask that I and my Friends should take part in the Commission. I referred to a statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I asked whether he was going to carry out that statement?

Mr. PLUNKET: The House will agree with me that it comes to very much the same thing; but the hon. Member is very anxious to get a grievance against the Government in any way he can. He next went on to deal with the question of Land Purchase, and I think the line he adopted on that branch of the subject was as audacious as almost anything else he said in his daring speech. It was evident he was extremely anxious to wash his hands of any complicity in the Act of 1885, known as Lord Ashbourne's Act; and for that purpose he raked up a number of personal charges against Members of the present Government, which have over and over again, in each case, been most absolutely and categorically denied. The hon. Member will not listen this evening to any proposed extension of the operation of the Land Purchase Act, because he says you cannot depend on anything in the nature of local guarantee. He says, and with great truth, that his estimate of the cost of carrying out the system of Land Purchase in Ireland was £100,000,000. On the same occasion the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian estimated that the operation would cost £300,000,000.

Mr. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): What year was that?

Mr. PLUNKET: I am going to read it. I say the right hon. Gentleman estimated, at the time I am referring to, that if the proposal then made were carried out it would require £300,000,000, and this was at the time the hon. Member for the City of Cork estimated it at £100,000,000. It was on the 12th of June, 1883, when my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) brought forward a Resolution; and it was in the debate on that Resolution that the right hon. Gentleman spoke as follows:—

"I may state, however, that the proposal would involve the question of a State guarantee to the extent of several hundreds of millions—£300,000,000 or £400,000,000."—(3 Hansard, [380] 451.)

The hon. Member for Cork immediately said "£100,000,000;" and in his own speech, on the same occasion, the hon. Member alluded to the subject, and said that he was greatly in favour of single ownership; that he was opposed to dual ownership; and that the only chance for the salvation of Ireland lay in every occupier being his own landlord.

Mr. PARNELL: I am in favour of it still.

Mr. PLUNKET: Very well, I am glad to hear it; but I venture to say the hon. Member left an impression on the House that he was opposed to it. He then said he was "speaking for himself," as this evening he told us he was speaking for himself, when he argued just now that—

"Nothing could be more untrustworthy than a local guarantee, and he was always of that opinion."

Mr. PARNELL: In congested districts.

Mr. PLUNKET: But in 1883 the hon. Gentleman said—

"As far as regarded the advance of money on the security of the local rates, the interposition of the Local Authority, and the advance of the whole of the purchase money, he saw no objection to the former, and he approved of the latter."

The Local Authority was good enough as security for the advance of the whole of the purchase money in 1883; but to-night the Local Authority is not at all reliable for less than the whole.

Mr. PARNELL: In congested districts. My references were entirely confined exclusively to them.

Mr. PLUNKET: When the hon. Member takes such pains to wash his hands of all responsibility for the Act of 1885 I would venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and to the House that it may make people a little cautious of the kind of undertakings which the hon. Member has lately given in support of the twin proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister. In the next place, the hon. Member for Cork proceeded to deal with judicial rents. He assigned, as I understood, three reasons why judicial rents are too highly assessed. The first was that the House of Lords mutilated the Land Act of 1881; the second was that the judgment in the famous case of "Adams v. Dunseath" gave an unjust preference to the landlords; and the third was that the Land Commissioners had allowed themselves to be browbeaten. I should like—as the House contains a good many new Members—that they should know the views held by the late Government on this question of judicial rents, and also particularly as to the case of "Adams v. Dunseath." There was a Bill brought forward by the Member for Cork in 1883, and it was opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in a very eloquent and powerful speech. It was also opposed by the then Solicitor General, afterwards Lord Herschell, and Lord Chancellor in the last Administration. Lord Herschell said the judgment in "Adams v. Dunseath" was perfectly correct, and he maintained that the provision in Clause 5 of the Bill was opposed to the decision in that case. They must, Lord Herschell said, take his scheme as a whole, and taking it in that way it came to nothing but this—that everything beyond prairie value would be deemed to be the property of the tenant. Therefore, I think the House will be slow to adopt the view of the hon. Member for Cork as to the unfairness of judicial rents against the authority of the great legal personage whom I have cited. The hon. Member alleges that these judicial rents have been unfairly fixed; and he says that owing to the fall in prices the greatest difficulty will be experienced in paying the present rents. No doubt there has been a certain fall in prices, although the estimates of that fall have been greatly exaggerated by the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends. What I want to put before the House is this—that it was the duty of the Sub-Commissioners, and I know it was their practice, to take into account, when fixing these judicial rents, the probability of a fall in prices. They fixed these rents in a falling market. ["Oh, oh!"] If it were at all necessary I would quote one or two instances of that kind. I will give one case. Mr. Commissioner Riordan, in December, 1881, dealing with a certain case, said that the rents had not been altered for a century, and the tenants and landlords were on the best of terms. The tenant right also had been valued at a high price on the estates. All these facts, he said, seemed to show that the rent was a fair one. Still, as the landlord had once given a reduction on a bad year, the Commissioners decided to reduce the rent, and Mr. Riordan added—

Mr. Plunket

"In my opinion, a fair rent should be such a rent as the tenant could pay through good years and bad."

In the next place, the hon. Member goes on to say that there will be numerous evictions, causing widespread suffering. First, as to the probability of this great number of evictions taking place. I think the House will be glad to hear that, so far from an increase in evictions lately, within the last 18 months the tendency has been to decrease; and, furthermore, as to that month of next November which is held up as so formidable in this matter of evictions, they are usually fewer then than in any other month of the year. The fact of the matter is, that you cannot obtain your decree until January at earliest. The evictions for the year 1885 were 3,127 tenancies. In 1,540 of these cases there was no actual disturbance of the tenants at all, and I am informed that it was officially calculated for the late Government that on an average it is in one only out of every five cases that the tenants are actually dispossessed, the rest being restored to their tenancies on their redeeming, or by arrangement with the landlords. Therefore only 600 are actually evicted, while 2,500 would be restored to their tenancies. I think that is a very important fact, which the House should be in possession of when they hear of these large number of evictions.

MR. PARNELL: Where do you get that information from?

MR. PLUNKET: I am informed that this information was obtained for the late Government within the last year. Furthermore it was stated the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) that there were means provided under the Land Act of 1881 by which tenants whom it was sought to evict could obtain, on showing proper cause, a stay of proceedings from the County Court. That is absolutely the fact; but, says the right hon. Gentleman, how are these poor people, who are very squalid and miserable, to take advantage of it? As a matter of fact, they do take advantage of it, as they took advantage of a more complicated Act—the Arrears Act—an Act specially passed to meet the case of these very poor people. As to the third part of the Amendment, the hon. Member has himself treated it in a very perfunctory manner, and I think I have already disposed of the matter by quotations from his previous speeches. The object of the Government is to carry further—and we believe successfully to carry further—the policy of the Act known as Lord Ashbourne's Act, and I am sure the House will be happy to hear that the number of persons applying to purchase their tenancies under that Act is steadily and rapidly increasing. Of course, that depends on one consideration. The possibility of the complete success of that Act, and of the other proposals of the Government for the improvement of the material condition of Ireland, must depend upon the success of their endeavours to preserve social order. So far as the Government is concerned, no one, I think, can accuse them of having taken any action or adopted any policy—hitherto at all events—whatever else you may criticize in our policy, that was not conceived in a spirit of conciliation. The hon. Member for the City of Cork drew a contrast—as he is very fond of doing—between the present Ministers and Lord Carnarvon, who was late Chief Governor of Ireland. He said that Lord Carnarvon had appealed to the Irish landlords to exercise their rights with mercy as well as justice, and he said—“Why did you not do so?” I think if the hon. Member had read, if he did not hear, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach last night, he would not have made that remark. My right hon. Friend made as fair and as effective an appeal of that kind as it was possible to make. But when the hon. Member accuses us—as he seemed to accuse us—of a desire to draw the people of Ireland into a resistance to the law by the policy which we propose and the words which we use, what shall we say of the words that he himself has just now used, in, I must say, his most cold-blooded manner, on this subject? He used that language to this House, to the Irish people, and to the world; that our policy of conciliation must fail, and he prophesied that we shall be driven to have recourse to stringent coercion in Ireland. Sir, it is only possible for Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to adopt a policy conciliatory to the Irish people; and I say in the presence of this House that the responsibility which the hon. Member for Cork has taken upon himself to-night is a responsibility awful and terrible in my mind.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): When I had the honour of addressing the House on Thursday evening last, at no great length, I confined myself to the matter of the Speech delivered from the Throne, which I conceived would be in conformity with usage; but entirely new matter has been submitted to us by Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. I, therefore, did not enter into any of the important questions which were opened after I sat down by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Do not let it be supposed that I am making it a subject of complaint; but the course which has been taken has been a very unusual one. I do not think that I can recollect, in the long course of years of the last half-century and more, a single occasion when the Government has thought it politic to use the Address to the Throne as the opportunity for explaining its policy beyond the compass of the Speech from the Throne. The present Government will, no doubt, have considered their own convenience and advantage—that is to say, the advantage to their policy—as they were entitled to consider. I am making no complaint of what they have done. I think that they will gain no undue advantage from it. One of the best-established maxims of all Parties and all legislators I have known in this country has been to keep back all statements of your principal intentions of policy, the principal enactments of the Bills you intended to introduce, until you could present them in the Parliamentary form in which you meant to give them. The present Government has given us, however, the main outlines of its policy on the occasion of the Speech from the Throne. Of course, I do not make it a matter of complaint on our side. They have done what I suspect, if it became a general practice, will be far from conducting to the interests and cause of legislation. Yet, although I make it no matter of complaint, it requires some comment upon the announcements which have been made. Part of that comment comes in the form of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), which forms the immediate alternative to the adoption of the Speech. It is not my intention to take any part in the division on that Amendment, should a division be pressed. I can perfectly understand why, with the knowledge which the hon. Member possesses, and with the responsibilities which he feels as an Irish Member, he should find himself entitled and bound to make declarations respecting the difficulty of the payment of rent in Ireland and respecting the probability of evictions, in which it would hardly be warrantable on my part to join, though, on the other hand, it is not in my power to assert the contrary of what has been stated by the hon. Gentleman. The reason why I do not wish to enter into a proceeding of that kind is this—that I think, upon the whole, it is for the advantage of the country that no attempt should be made by the House at large, as distinguished from the Representatives of Ireland, and those who may think fit to act with them—that no attempt should be made to procure a precipitate or hasty decision by the House upon the policy propounded by Her Majesty's Government. It would not be fair to the Government; it would not be fair to the House. We have no sufficient opportunity of understanding all the details and particulars of that policy, though much has been told us; and I do not think that the interests of the country would be promoted by endeavouring, on the occasion of the Speech from the Throne, to obtain a definitive judgment from the House. Well, Sir, but that is no reason, I think, why there should not be free comment upon the policy which has been declared to us. That free comment has, indeed, been offered by Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and by Gentlemen on this side of the House not altogether accordant in their views. The first observation I make is, that this policy has been presented to us in forms materially different. The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented it in the form which he thought proper on the night when the Address was moved. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland again presented it last night in what we conceived to be a reduced and modified form. On the other hand, in "another place," with not less authority, the form of that policy was presented larger than either; and there is some difficulty in determining which of these three forms is the most authentic and the most to be relied upon. If that largest form had been definitely withdrawn, I do not hesitate to say that it would be a matter to me of comfort and satisfaction. But it has not been stated that it has been withdrawn. Probably it may be admitted that there is the difference which I think will be seen in the statements of the three Ministers to whom I have referred. The leading points in this policy I think are five. In the first place, the issue of the Commissions; in the second place, the introduction of the subject of public works; in the third place, the subject of land purchase; in the fourth place, inquiry into land rents; and, in the fifth place, the reference to local government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary drew a contrast between this policy and the policy of the late Government, and said that, whatever else this policy might be, he considered it a sober policy. Sir, I am not able to give to it that particular epithet. I will say that the light in which it presents itself to me is that of an eminently complex and an eminently difficult policy. In speaking of the policy of the late Government during the Elections I ventured to say that it presented an extremely simple issue. I did not mean that the measures necessary for carrying it into effect were simple measures; they were, on the contrary, of a very complex character. But the issue presented to the country was, notwithstanding, a very simple issue. It was whether you would, or whether you would not, give a Statutory Parliament to Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I rise to a point of Order, Sir. I am very sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; but I am obliged to direct the attention of the Chair to the terms of the Address, and to ask whether it is competent, under the terms of the Amendment, for hon. Members following the speech of the hon. Member for Cork to travel to any extent wide of the definite terms of that Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: The ruling of the Chair has been that when the general debate on the Address appears to have terminated by the introduction of an Amendment, then the general discussion on the Address is closed; and when an Amendment is proposed the discussion is confined to the subject-matter of that Amendment. Of course, when the hon. Member for Cork introduces his Amendment he refers, before proposing the Amendment, to a variety of subjects; but he concludes with an Amendment. Having concluded with an Amendment, it is a specific Amendment before the House, and the general question of relevancy applies. It would be out of Order, for instance, in my opinion, to refer to the question of Burmah on the specific Amendment. Though the subject of land will be in some degree pertinent to the Amendment, it would be more strictly in Order if the debate were henceforth more strictly confined to the specific terms of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think myself rather hardly used. It has been the invariable practice for a great many years in this House that the Leader of the Opposition should speak on the Speech from the Throne; and the very fact that that has been the invariable practice shows that the debate is confined to the matter of the Speech till Amendments begin. Now, Sir, for the first time for half-a-century large plans of policy are introduced after I had addressed the House, not by Amendments, but by Her Majesty's Government; and, therefore, Sir, I make my petition to the House. If the House think sit right that in consequence of my conforming to the practice and maintaining in my own person a practice which is convenient to the House, but beyond all things for the convenience of the Government, I should be excluded from making any remarks on the policy which the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced after the speech I made—if, Sir, that be the judgment of the House, if it be your judgment, I am perfectly content to give way at once. But I have known many instances—[Loud Ministerial cries of "Order!"]. If I am forbidden to speak upon the policy which, contrary to usage, the noble Lord on the part of the Government introduced in a manner unknown before—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I really think I must, for the convenience of the House, state this much. Though I do adhere to the ruling I have given, that after an Amendment has been proposed discussion should be relevant to that Amendment, I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that when the Amendment is concluded the Address again open to amendment in the interval between that Amendment and possibly a subsequent Amendment. But when an Amendment is before the House I am only interpreting the Rules by saying that the discussion must be generally relevant to the subject-matter of the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I rise, Sir, to ask a question on the point of Order. I need not point out to you that my right hon. Friend could not speak at the stage to which you refer, because he had already spoken on the Address when it was generally before the House. I wish to ask you whether, if it be necessary, in consequence of the objection taken by the noble Lord to my right hon. Friend being allowed an opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government, that another Amendment should be moved, it would not be possible—though, unfortunately, it would protract the Sittings of the House—at a later stage, if such an Amendment be moved, for my right hon. Friend to make a statement on the subject of the Government policy?

MR. SPEAKER: I have laid down my ruling perfectly indifferent to the convenience of any hon. or right hon. Gentleman. Of course, it would be competent for an Amendment to be subsequently moved if the right hon. Gentleman desires to go into the subject-matter of the policy of the Government.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I hope, Sir, that no person will suppose that I questioned one syllable that has fallen from you; but I have frequently known occasions in this House when, in consequence of peculiar circumstances in a debate, indulgence has been extended by the House. My application is for that indulgence. ["Order!"] I have no intention of detaining the House at great length. If there is a disposition to grudge that indulgence I will not press the suit; but if it is granted I will venture to make a few remarks.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I should be most anxious myself to grant any indulgence necessary to the right hon. Gentleman; but I would desire to remove what appears to me to be a misapprehension. What I have doubts about and am most anxious about is the prolongation of the debate which is likely to occur if all hon. Members were to recur to other matters.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I shall endeavour to use with very great moderation that indulgence for which I have asked, and for the occasion of which I do not hold myself responsible, since my object in rising on Thursday night was to conform to a practice eminently convenient to the Business of the House, and most convenient to the Government of the day. I was in the act of saying that when we proposed to give a Statutory Parliament to Ireland, our meaning was that we should at length let Ireland transact her own affairs upon her own responsibility, and should relieve ourselves of the management of her internal affairs. Well, to that plan, I think, there was one incidental exception, with respect to the purchase of land, upon which I will not now dwell; but what I wish to point out is that the policy now announced is the absolute inversion of that policy. I am not making it a matter of blame; but it seems to me a necessary consequence of the footing upon which the Government have taken Office that Ireland is not to transact her own affairs, but that England is to assume a number of responsibilities, heavy beyond anything, involving the most complicated discussion, and, in my opinion, rendering progress of the most essential and difficult and important Business of Great Britain impossible. I say that because

I see what has now happened in the outline that I have drawn of the proposals of the present Government. Here are three great subjects—namely, first of all, the appointment of Commissions; secondly, the scheme of inquiry with respect to public works; and, thirdly, the subject of land rents, which are complete additions to what we had before the House. Well, with regard to these Commissions, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland thinks he has been reproached—he may have been reproached, I do not know it—with having advised these Commissions as a means for protracting his tenure of Office. He protested, and I think very properly, against the putting of any such construction upon the appointment of the Commissions, and when it was intimated that he himself had given in to that practice he said emphatically "Never." I beg to refresh the memory of the right hon. Gentleman. In the month of May or the beginning of June we stated that it was our intention, should the Bill for the better government of Ireland receive the sanction of the House on the second reading, that as we could not finish that Bill and likewise the Land Question within the ordinary period of the Session, we intended to ask the House to adjourn further progress with it until the beginning of October, and the right hon. Gentleman said—"Oh, see what this means; this is, in point of fact, to be a Continuance in Office Bill." Now I quote this in no invidious or polemical sense; but I heartily rejoice that the preaching of the right hon. Gentleman is better than his practice. Moreover, I am convinced it is his preaching, and not the mere accidental reference to which I have now alluded, that exhibits the true state of his mind. These charges of advising inquiries for the sake of continuance in Office are not worthy of the House, and not worthy of political Parties in this country. Sir, I make no such charge; but I must not be precluded from observing that the appointment of these Commissions, and especially of the Commission with respect to land, does introduce most serious delay into the progress of this House with the Public Business, and especially with the Irish Business of this country. What is laid out before us is that probably in the end of the Spring the Commission may report. We are now in the month of August; in the end of the spring the Commission may report upon the subject of rents. I think anyone can see that it is no exaggeration to state that if the Commission is to inquire into rents and report upon rents in the end of the spring, and if the Government is then, to use the phrase of the noble Lord, to give "immense consideration" to what the Commission may report, the chances of legislation upon this subject, immediately and closely connected with social order, even during the next year, are very slight indeed. With respect to public works I will not say more than a word, because I think that what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley last night, and stated to-night by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), in his powerful speech, shows but too well upon how dangerous a course the House is invited to embark. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said £750,000 is not a very alarming sum. No, Sir, it is not a very alarming sum, if I am to consider it as an amount of money; but there are two modes of dealing with these pecuniary questions. The first is for the Gentleman who makes the proposal to state some initial expenditure that is afterwards to receive some indefinite expansion, and the other is to state at the very outset the outside of the whole expenditure to which you think the principle of your proposal, if fully adopted, can by possibility lead. Sir, it was for taking that course with regard to our Land Purchase Bill that both the Bill itself and the sister Bill with respect to the Government of Ireland suffered so heavily at the hands of Parliament. I know very well that you are liable to suffer heavily for taking such a course. You may frighten, you may alarm and shake the nerve, so to speak, of Parliament for the moment; but, at the same time, I think it is a better course than that which has happened in the case of almost all the greatest and most costly works of fortification that we have attempted during my Parliamentary life, when a few hundreds of thousands of pounds are first submitted to Parliament as the ascertained expense, and then in course of time from year to year those hundreds of thousands are expanded into millions.

What is the object of the right hon. Gentleman in this plan? It is not merely to execute works useful in themselves; but he very fairly stated that his object was to find employment for a large portion of the people of Ireland who cannot obtain an adequate subsistence from the holdings that they occupy. But is an outlay of £750,000 to attain that great national object? On the contrary—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will endeavour to explain what I did say to the best of my recollection. I referred to the foundation, so to speak, of the deep sea fishing industry on the West Coast of Ireland as affording employment and means of subsistence to the practically almost starving population of the West Coast; and I referred to the expenditure of £750,000, not as affording employment, but as carrying out that system of drainage in Ireland of which, indeed, the smaller parts are already carried out, but which it is necessary to complete by arterial works.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I perfectly understood that; but the right hon. Gentleman referred to the defective employment of a large portion of the people of Ireland who cannot properly subsist upon their holdings, and the advantage of finding labour for that portion of the population. That, in my opinion, is a work in itself most difficult for this Parliament, and, through the administration known as the Dublin Castle administration, perfectly hopeless. But I will not dwell upon that subject or enter into its details. I wish to say one word upon the subject of Land Purchase. My noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), last night, in referring to the Land Purchase Bill, stated, I think, that he considered the security upon which the advances under that Bill had been made was a very deficient and bad security. I am not going now to defend it; but that security was the entire Revenue of Ireland, as well as the entire land rents of Ireland. That security is deemed an insufficient security. Well, Sir, I hope that those critics who showed such patriotic vigour in dealing with the security proposed under our Bill will be no less patriotic and rigid in considering the security under the Government proposals. We are now promised a large extension, if I understand it, of Lord Ashbourne's Bill, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork is deemed to be very inconsistent because he did not entirely condemn the guarantee of Local Authorities under Lord Ashbourne's Bill and at the same time objects to that guarantee under the present circumstances of the case. But, Sir, I must observe this—that the guarantee of Local Authorities may be tolerable at any rate in the very limited transactions where in any one county in Ireland it was most improbable that more than a very few hundred thousand pounds could be laid out. But that is not the state of facts now before us. The object of the Government apparently is to have a large scheme of Land Purchase; and, Sir, I must confess I cannot express too strongly my opinion that the guarantee of Local Authorities for a plan of that kind, whatever be the intention of the Government in proposing it, would, if adopted, prove the veriest delusion to the country, and would be totally ineffective for the purpose of securing the advances that might be made from the Treasury. No doubt, this is a very large scheme. This is not a question of £5,000,000 or of £10,000,000; it is a question of converting dual ownership into single ownership—that is as far at least as our plan went. Our plan excluded from operation all rents held by landlords, all demesnes, all residences, and made other important deductions from the total of the land of Ireland. I will not pronounce any opinion on this matter at present further than that to the point of security for advances the closest and most vigilant attention of the House must be directed, and also to the extension of the system of creditorship and debtorship between the Exchequer of this country and the individual occupier of the land of Ireland. The first of these points demands the most jealous inspection; and, as regards the second, considering the broad objections to be taken, on the ground partly of economical and still more of political danger, Her Majesty's Government will find that they have undertaken no holiday task. But much more formidable than the question of Land Purchase is the question of Land Rents. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that the sober plan of appointing a Commission to examine into the whole of the land rents of Ireland, or the judicial rents—I am not quite sure whether we are to understand that the inquiry will be confined to the judicial rents—[Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: To the judicial rents.] Well, Sir, the subject-matter may in that way be limited, but the difficulties of principle are increased. Here the doctrine has been laid down, and we ought to know from Her Majesty's Government without delay whether that doctrine is to be maintained or not, that in cases where judicial rents are extravagant, where the real rent which the land will bear is below the judicial rent, the tenant is to be charged on the basis of the real rentable value, that the landlord is to be paid on the basis of the judicial rent, and the difference is to be found elsewhere. That statement has been made, and made by adequate authority, on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It is not an unfair or an extreme proposition to ask Her Majesty's Government whether such an intention is or is not entertained. Whether they may carry it into law or not I will not ask, for no power on earth, no power within these walls or beyond them, will succeed in carrying into law such a proposition. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord opposito have made no reference to this subject. They seem to be what is called "shy of it." While those more immediately interested in the question of the money are no doubt entitled to attach the greatest importance to such a declaration, on the other hand, the taxpayers of this country are entitled to and must attach the greatest importance to it; and not only the taxpayers of this country, but all the debtors in this country, all men who find that their incomes are in an uncertain condition, and that the obligation which others have undertaken towards them cannot, under the existing circumstances, always be fulfilled. In principle such a plan is, in my opinion, totally inadmissible. It establishes a distinction between judicial rents and other rents in respect to the title of the landlord which we have never admitted and never can admit. The title of the landlord receiving rent, in the one case, is just as good and sacred in every point as it is in the other. Even if the plan of the Government could be adopted, I do not believe that any power on earth could confine it to judicial rents. You would find the claim of the receiver of non-judicial rents in Ireland perfectly irresistible after the claim of the holder of judicial rents had been admitted to receive compensation from the State. Then I come to the question of this appointment of a Commission upon rents considered in relation to the question of social order. We did not touch the question of rents in our policy at all. We endeavoured to give Ireland the management of her own affairs, and give the Irish landlord the power of transferring his estate to the Irish authority upon fair market terms. Here I must say a word upon what fell from my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale last night. When he spoke of this proposition that the State should pay the difference between the judicial rent and the rent that the land would bear, he said that there was something of that principle in the Land Purchase Bill. Well, my noble Friend did not give us his opinion upon the proposition that the State should bear the charge, and I am sorry that he did not do so. But I most emphatically say, as one connected with the Land Purchase Bill, that there was not one shred or tittle in that Bill of the principle that the State should pay an unreal value. The principle in that Bill was that we were to discover as well as we could the real, fair, equitable, market value of the property and purchase it on the basis of that value. You will say that we offered 20 years' purchase. We took 20 years as the best result we could arrive at; but it was merely the expression of our opinion upon a very difficult and complex question; and the House of Commons, most certainly, if that Bill had proceeded, would not have taken 20 years upon our credit and authority. It might have been shown that the period was too long or that it was too short. I do not enter into that question now. I must say that it appears to me that nothing could have been more unfortunate than the relation of this Commission upon rent to the social circumstances of Ireland. The Commission is to report late next spring. It has been shown by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) who has just sat down—and no doubt he is accurate—that no decree can be obtained for the November rent before January at the soonest, and that a further time must elapse before evictions for those rents can actually take place. That may be so; but I do not think that the institution of a multitude of processes of evictions, perfectly well known to the people, next winter, and even before the decrees, can have a very favourable effect on the social order of the country. Even on the showing of the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself these evictions will take place before the Report of the Commission, and, a fortiori, before it is possible that there can be any legislation upon it. Therefore, we are in this position, that we are saying to the tenant—"You must pay your rent in November on pain of eviction;" and, at the same time, we are insinuating—and more than insinuating, we are carrying with considerable authority into his mind—the belief that his rent is an unjust rent by appointing a Commission to inquire whether it is unjust or not. No one can doubt that the mere fact of appointing such a Commission tends to favour evictions in November; much more does the most unfortunate declaration of the noble Lord tend in that direction. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did all he could to soften that declaration in his speech, of the tone of which no one has any title or disposition to complain. But the noble Lord did undoubtedly and emphatically assert the title of the landlord to the full assistance of the law in the exaction of his full rights, and did not accompany that statement with any appeal to the landlords for a clement and moderate exercise of those powers. He must have had the circumstances of Lord Carnarvon's appeal some months ago in his mind; but passing by that appeal altogether he makes this declaration as to the landlord's title. Who doubted the landlord's title? If the landlord's title is the subject of no doubt why was that declaration made; and how, again, can it be construed in Ireland except as an encouragement to the landlords towards the prompt and extensive exercise of the right and the power of eviction upon the non-payment of rent? It is an encouragement to evictions, and something else besides. It is not only an encouragement to eviction, but it is a great discouragement to remissions. What landlord having a judicial rent can be expected to make remissions, however great the pressure of the times, in the face of the inquiries of this Commission? By making remissions does not he admit that his rent is too high, does he not prejudice his case before the Commission? Why, Sir, I do not require to travel far for an authority. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down supplied me with the authority. If he were to repeat the words that he quoted from Sub-Commissioner Reardon under the Land Act, they would express the very feeling that I describe. The landlord referred to refused to make a remission of his rent, because, he said, it would prejudice his case before the Court. Well, if it would prejudice the case of the landlord before the Court where a tenant claimed a reduction, exactly on the same principle if a number of humane and considerate landlords reduced their judicial rents in face of the inquiry before the Commission, how do you escape the consequence that those judicial rents will be likely to be prejudiced by the act of the landlord himself, and that they will be taken to be too high for the tenants to pay? There is one other point on which I must say a word. The Government have intimated to us their intention to introduce a measure for the establishment or extension of local government in Ireland. As far as I apprehend the case, that announcement on their part is not accompanied with a repetition of a declaration made in January by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland—namely, that the then Government would propose no measure for the establishment of popular local institutions in Ireland of a nature that could possibly be used as a leverage for obtaining further change. I hope I may infer that, as that ominous declaration has not been repeated, it has been dropped. Undoubtedly he will be a very ingenious man who would introduce popular institutions of any kind in any part of Ireland, and at the same time take effectual security that they should not be used as a leverage for further change. I am glad, so far, to observe that this announcement is apparently liberated from that serious encumbrance; but I do not believe that the announcement can or will be satisfactory while it is coupled, as it is coupled by the noble Lord, with the necessity of conforming to what England and Scotland may now think necessary for their own local institutions. I will not enter in detail into these questions, but I will say that such a limitation is most unjust to Ireland and hardly less unjust to Scotland. Scotland has given no thought to this great subject of extended local government. The mind of Scotland has not ripened upon that question. It would be a very unfortunate state of things if you take the measure of Scotland's desires before those desires have been matured, and when, in fact, they have scarcely ever found vent at all, and say that you will grant to Ireland nothing beyond the limit of those desires. There was an important point referred to by my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale last night upon which I would say a word. My noble Friend spoke of local government, and said he reserved his judgment. But what I want to know is, does my noble Friend adhere—I feel convinced that he does—to the principles he himself declared on the subject? My noble Friend's progress in this matter has been slow, but I think it has been sure in one and the same direction, and during the Elections my noble Friend in one of his speeches declared certain principles upon which he was ready to grant local government—a considerable measure of self-government—to Ireland. It was the more emphatic because my noble Friend himself gave emphasis to the change, or at least to the expansion, of his opinion. He said that the change of circumstances had convinced him that much must be done in this direction. My noble Friend laid down four conditions of great importance on both sides. The first was that the Imperial Parliament was to continue to represent the whole of the United Kingdom, and that the Irish Members were to retain their seats in this House. The second was that powers were to be given to the Irish Legislature by delegation and not by surrender. I do not believe that any Gentleman below the Gangway would make the smallest difficulty on that subject, for I do not believe it is possible for the wit of man to devise any legislative measure by which you could do anything but delegate powers or by which you could contrive to surrender them. The third was that the Irish

Legislative Body was only to have control in certain subjects which were to be enumerated—instead of enumerating the exceptions—he laid great stress on that—and they were still to be subject to a right of control or revision within the walls of the two Houses of Parliament—a provision undoubtedly of very great importance as a limitation, it may be said, perhaps, a mutilation; at any rate, as an effective limitation and restriction of the plans proposed by the late Government. The fourth was that the administration of justice was to remain under the authority and responsibility of Parliament. I do not know how far my noble Friend is to carry that proposition; whether he wishes to deny to a Body legislating in Ireland, for certain enumerated purposes, the power with respect to the police and justice which is given to every municipality in this country. I do not know, but I take these conditions as they stand. They were conditions perfectly incompatible with the Bill we had the honour to submit to Parliament, and quite impossible to be accepted by the authors of that Bill—conditions that I never could regard as giving any full or final satisfaction to the reasonable wishes or wants of the people of Ireland. Now, let me look from the other side upon these conditions, because there is a matter of great importance to be observed on the other side. They, one and all of them, proceed upon the assumption that there is to be one Central Body governing and legislating in Ireland for certain enumerated purposes. That is the policy to which my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale has advanced; that is the policy which he believes to be necessary, having undergone a process of expansion, in his opinion, in consequence of the change of circumstances which has taken place. Does my noble Friend adhere to that policy? Does he think Ireland is entitled to ask for the institution of such a Central Body? Will Her Majesty's Government entertain that principle? Will they try whether by the adoption of that principle they can establish what is called a modus vivendi between themselves and the Irish people? I make this suggestion with no concealment of what my own views are; but, at same time, with this sentiment—that there are those in this House—for example, my noble Friend—who wish to do much for Ireland, though they will not do that which we ask them to do. Surely, after the part which my noble Friend and those around have taken, after the manner in which, by their indefatigable exertions, the late Government suffered defeat in this House and at the polls, he has a good claim on the present Government to extend a little the unnatural and factitious limit which they profess it to be their intention to place on local government in Ireland, and to see whether they cannot at least bring their liberality up to the point—which we must presume to be a very safe one—proposed by my noble Friend. There is another point connected with local government on which I wish to make an appeal. I have been speaking with great regret of the delay which it appears to me will be introduced into Irish and English legislation in consequence of the appointment of more than one Commission on subjects upon which I believe ample information is already in the hands of Parliament. But I am inclined to hope, listening to what has been said, that that delay need not affect the plans with regard to local government in Ireland.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Certainly not.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Certainly not. At any rate, then we may hope that at the commencement of the next Session of Parliament the Government will be prepared with their plans for local government, and that they will not depend upon any previous inquiry by their Commissions. I gather that from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, and I receive it with satisfaction.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : I do not wish my reply carried further than it was intended to go; what I meant was, that, except in regard to the points named, an inquiry into those two questions upon which Commissions were to be issued would not in any way delay the consideration of the question of local government. How the Government would approach that was stated by my noble Friend, and also by myself.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I quite accept the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. I have no right in any way to tie the right hon. Gentleman by his words to any particular course with regard to local government beyond this. I must own, in conformity with what

fell from me on Thursday night, I am quite at a loss to understand how the Government should find it necessary, in the month of August, to postpone to February their measure with regard to local government, and we reserve our right to make any comments we may think fit to make upon the course which the Government may take in that respect. I trusted the proposals with regard to local government would not be affected by the delay incidental to the operation of the Commissions so far as that is concerned, and I think the right hon. Gentleman has given me ample satisfaction by a distinct answer. I have not intentionally exaggerated, or said, or done anything either to introduce heat into the debate, or to darken unnecessarily the prospect which is before us; but I own it is not in my opinion other than a very dark prospect. I see in it a very large and great widening of the field of Irish legislation. I see in it an enormous augmentation of the bulk of Irish Business. I see in it, therefore, a very great addition to that which at present, by the magnitude it already offers to us, is the main obstacle to our transaction of the proper and immediate Business in regard to England and Scotland. I see in it, Sir, a delay which is, to my mind, a grave mistake in connection with national questions which have been raised with respect to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said last night that he considered that the difficulties of governing Ireland had been much increased in consequence of the propositions that we had made. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that in that announcement he was in diametrical contradiction to the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because when I asked that noble Lord—"How is it that, having thought coercion necessary in January last, now, although there has been no diminution but rather a slight increase in crime, you think coercion to be unnecessary?" the noble Lord answered—

"On account of the enormous change of circumstances; you have become the leaders of the Nationalists in Ireland, and therefore we are entitled to presume that legality will be now the general rule in that country."

If legality is the rule, that is the greatest diminution of the difficulties of government, and is not an increase of them. One thing I must say; hon. Gentlemen seem ready to catch at the imputation that we have become the leaders of the Nationalists in Ireland, as if that were a serious charge against the late Government. For my part I am delighted to have had any share or part whatever in becoming either leader or follower, I care not which, in any movement that tends by soothing the people of Ireland and by encouraging them to hope for the realization of their just claims—I am delighted to think that we shall have had a share, according to the noble Lord, who gives us in his bounty a very large share indeed, if not the whole, in establishing better ideas with regard to legality in Ireland. But this I must say—it is not in our power to answer for the state of Ireland as long as you choose to continue a system under which you have this sad fact staring you in the face, that whereas law in England is administered in an English spirit, and law in Scotland is administered in a Scotch spirit, law in Ireland is not administered in an Irish spirit. With that state of facts staring you in the face we may teach legality, and we shall teach it to the best of our power, but you cannot give security for social order in Ireland. I think I have shown to the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary, on the authority of his Colleague, that we have done something, not to increase, but to diminish his difficulties, which I quite grant are serious enough. But what I fear is that the policy now advanced will again increase those difficulties which we have been struggling, apparently with some success, to diminish, because the Government point out to Ireland the adjournment of her hopes at the very best and the pursuit of measures which she does not want, and which, although offered to her as boons, she is likely to receive rather with resentment than with gratitude. In fact, the noble Lord and his Colleagues offer a prolongation of a controversy already too long, and the postponement as long as their efforts can postpone it, of that consummation which alone can give rest and repose to Ireland, and alone can bring to a close the period of its political agitation.

Mr. HARRIS (Galway, E.) said, that the other night he had thought it necessary, in view of recent events that had occurred, to point to future dangers that would inevitably arise in Ireland, and he was sorry to say that they had already come into existence. In the South of the County Galway, the Eastern portion of which he represented, disturbances had already taken place, owing to the determination of the Marquess of Clanricarde, an absentee Nobleman, to exterminate his poor tenantry about Woodford. The noble Marquess never visited Ireland, and never paid any attention to the large interests that he had under his charge in Ireland, except the interest of collecting his rents. His poor tenantry in that wild mountainous district had mainly reclaimed their holdings from barrenness; and if they were to be paid for their improvements, the noble Marquess who was now engaged in the terrible work of evicting them would have very little indeed to add to his receipts in the way of rent. It was a pitiable thing that this noble Marquess should be allowed to evict and to exterminate these poor people. There appeared to be a general feeling in both Houses of Parliament in favour of the creation of a peasant proprietary; but how was it that such proprietaries were not established? He could not understand why it was that Parliament should get into a state of paralysis with regard to the Irish Question. It was admitted that the establishment of a peasant proprietary in Ireland was the only final settlement of this question. Yet the House did not legislate on the subject, while it refused to allow an Irish Parliament to take it in hand. If the House was in such a paralytic condition that they could not legislate properly in regard to Irish affairs, they had much better allow Ireland to do so herself. If the people of Ireland had the government of their country under their own control for 12 months, they would establish a peasant proprietary on a just and sound basis. The hon. Member was going to speak of the bearing of religious differences upon Irish tenants, when he was interrupted by Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.), who, rising to Order, inquired whether the hon. Member's remarks were relevant to the Amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER replied that they were not.

Mr. HARRIS then offered some observation upon butter, whisky, and other Irish produce, upon which

Mr. SPEAKER informed him again that he was wandering from the Question.

Mr. HARRIS, resuming, said, he did not see why the House should look with such especial tenderness on the rights of landlords, or treat them differently from other men who found their means of living in other ways than from the land. They were only entitled to get the market value of their property, and they were not a class of men who were deserving of consideration by reason of the consideration they had shown for the people.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being present,

Mr. HARRIS, resuming, said, a very slight acquaintance with the state of things that existed and had existed in Ireland, England, and Scotland, would show that the landlords were the most merciless, inconsiderate, cruel, inhuman, anti-social, and anti-national class of men that existed.

Mr. HEATH (Lincolnshire, Louth) said, that the Conservative Members had been told that they were, by the Irish Land Purchase proposals of the Government, called on to violate or give up all the pledges which they had given at the last Election. Now, he did not deny that most of them were steeped to the lips in pledges against the Land Purchase Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and the Conservative Party had, no doubt, gained many seats by those pledges; but he (Mr. Heath) contended that the proposals of the present Government stood on a very different footing from the proposals of the late Government. He represented a constituency containing 8,000 agricultural labourers, and he should be the last man to support any policy which risked any part of their hard-earned money. Now, the investment of the English taxpayers' money, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian proposed, was one on which no prudent man or man of business would have lent his money; because, if the Home Rule Bill of the late Government had been passed, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his followers would have been in power in Ireland. That hon. Member had said that rent ought only to be paid on Irish land at prairie value—something like 3d., 6d., or 1s. per acre. How could he, after saying that, tell the

Irish people that they ought to pay for the holdings at the price of 20 years' judicial rents. Was it likely that the hon. Gentleman and his supporters would have gone back when in power, on what they had said when out of power? It was clear that those who would have been in power, if the Home Rule Bill had passed, could not compel the people of Ireland to pay their existing rent, or anything like it, to the Government instead of to their landlords; and that was why he went against the Land Purchase proposals of the late Government. But it seemed to him (Mr. Heath) that the so-called Land Purchase proposals of the present Government were very different. In the first place, they did not reach to nearly so large an amount as the £150,000,000 which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) calculated would be involved in the proposals of the late Government, and the security of the money to be advanced, if it was advanced, was the whole power of the British Government, the pledges of the present Government, and the existing law under which a certain amount of rents in Ireland, and all rents in England, were now paid. All that the Chancellor of the Exchequer desired was simply to carry out in an enlarged and improved form the Land Act of 1885, for which they were indebted to Lord Ashbourne. The money hitherto advanced under the Act had so far returned the rate of interest at which it was lent. Then, the Government of Ireland was not now in the hands of Gentlemen who maintained that land in Ireland was only of prairie value. The English money advanced to Land Improvement Companies was now considered to be invested on as good security as any in England. If money was advanced by the Government, as they now proposed, it would be the first charge on the land under a settled and established Government. He did not believe that the Conservative Leaders were going to ask their followers to revoke or in any way to go against their pledges, and they would support them confidently in the belief that the proposals they made were in no way contrary to the pledges hon. Members had made. The proposals did not contemplate the transfer of the land of Ireland forcibly from one class to another, nor did they involve the Government of Ireland being placed in the hands of men who held, as he already said, that the tenants in Ireland ought to have the land at prairie value. He looked with entire approval on the proposal to establish fishery harbours on the West Coast of Ireland. Surely, the great cause of the misery on the West Coast of Ireland, as it was on the West Coast of Scotland, was that there were too many people on the land; and, therefore, unless they were emigrated—a course which he deprecated—the only way to make them flourish was to give them other means of making a livelihood—means that would enable them to eke out their precarious gains from the land by reaping the harvest of the sea. Then, with respect to the proposal to promote works of arterial drainage. In the first place, the construction of these works would immediately furnish a large amount of employment to a large class of the populace by whom it was greatly needed. Then, in the second, the works, when completed, would enable a much larger part of Ireland than at present to be cultivated. He was sorry to see that the population of Ireland was diminishing. By the extension of arterial drainage, that tendency would be checked; because, if they virtually increased the size of the land, they would enable it to support a greater population. Then it was said that the Members on that side of the House were representatives of a class, and that they were proposing to take money from the English people and give it to the Irish landlords. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, it was true that, in one sense, he represented a class, for he represented a nearly purely agricultural constituency, including, as he had already said, 8,000 labourers; but he should certainly be very sorry to propose any expenditure of money by which they would lose, and he did not believe that any loss would be incurred by the expenditure which the Government proposed. He believed that if money was advanced in the manner and under the conditions which they proposed—so far as he understood them—no risk would be incurred by the English taxpayer, and that the Irish would pay the interest on such loans in the same way that they now paid the interest on the money advanced on drainage loans. In fact, he believed that as long as Ireland was united to England, and was under the same Government as at present, there would be a good and safe security for such advances as the Government proposed to make for the promotion of Irish improvements. But he believed that if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) and his followers were in power there would be no security at all for any money which might be advanced for Irish purposes.

Mr. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol) said, that in his belief a great many of the proposals which had been made by the Government merely meant the improvement of the value of landed property in Ireland at the expense of the English taxpayer. The Land Purchase scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian might have been right, or it might have been wrong; but, at any rate, it had this merit, that before one penny could be touched, Ireland was pledged to meet the obligation. Whatever might be said as to the merit of the late Government's proposal, the safety of it could not be questioned. He

Mr. Cossham listened with great attention to the speech the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered the other evening, and was bound to congratulate him upon the great improvement in his style. He, however, could not agree with the noble Lord's conclusions. The noble Lord maintained that he and his Party had been sent to the House of Commons to maintain the Union with Ireland. He (Mr. Cossham) maintained that the Union had never been seriously attacked. Men might differ as to the methods by which the Union was to be maintained; but those who held the views he did asserted that the best way to secure real union with Ireland was to give the Irish people self-government. So far from endeavouring to quench the national aspirations of the Irish people, they ought to hail them with satisfaction. However much they might fence with the question, he felt confident that they must give Ireland a large share in the control of its own affairs. Every section of a nation knew its own wants better than anyone else; and it would be a very happy day, and they would be relieved of a very great deal of anxiety, when they invited the Irish people to manage their own affairs. That night they were called upon to deal with the Amendment of the hon.

Gentleman the Member for Cork, and he (Mr. Cossham) intended not only to support the Amendment by his voice, but by his vote. He regarded the Amendment as the natural reply to the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which he elaborated the schemes by which the present Government intended to meet the wants and wishes and difficulties of Ireland. The proposal to make up the rents of the Irish landlords out of the taxes of the English people was one of the most extraordinary that could be made. Seeing that the noble Lord had ventured to make such a proposition, the hon. Member for Cork had been well advised in bringing forward this Amendment. He was ready to admit that right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench meant to treat Ireland fairly; but he (Mr. Cossham) contended they were mistaken in their views. They took into their view the interest of the landlords simply. He wanted to take into view the interests of the people. He felt that the fundamental error that existed in the minds of many hon. Members was that the people existed for the Government, whereas the Government existed for the people. He had been disappointed that so many hon. Members confined their attention to what was best for the governing classes, and not to what was best for the people in Ireland. It was quite clear that something would have to be done; and he hoped that even from the present Government the House might hear some proposals by-and-bye, out of which they might produce some measures that would tend to the pacification and the future happiness of Ireland. He pleaded that night as an English Member representing a democratic class of people who had to pay taxes—people who would get no advantage out of the making up of the rents of the landlords. On the behalf of these people, he entered his strongest protest against this attempt to prop up the rents of the Irish landlords out of the English taxes. If that proposition ever took a form in which the House could deal with it in a substantial way, he predicted that however much the Government might boast of their majority, that majority would soon melt away. In conclusion, he hoped that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches would not assume that, because the Elections had gone against the view he (Mr. Cossham) and his Friends held, that decision was permanent. More than 2,000,000 of people voted for Home Rule, and a much larger number would have voted for Home Rule had it not been associated with the Land Purchase scheme. The Land Purchase scheme of the late Government was mildness itself in comparison with the view expressed by the present Government, and, therefore, he hoped to see adopted the Amendment which the hon. Member for Cork had moved in a speech of singular ability—a speech in which he appealed not to Irish prejudices, but to English common sense.

Mr. LIONEL COHEN (Paddington, N.) said, he believed that the principles raised by the Amendment would, if they were affirmed, not only injuriously affect the condition of the Irish tenants, but they would also affect, in a large degree, the legislation of the House in a sense which anyone who regarded the economical policy pursued by this country for many years past would regret to see followed. He contended that the terms and language of the Amendment were inconsistent and illogical, and that its scope and tendency were dangerous and mischievous in their nature. As a Member of the recent Commission on the Depression of Trade, he would say that there was no more striking evidence of the depression which affected land in Ireland than that of Mr. M. O'Brien, the Land Commissioner, who superintended the sales under the Act of 1881. It had been stated by the Irish Members that the prices of agricultural produce had fallen 40 per cent since 1881; but that was not the case. Taking all agricultural produce together, it was established that the fall was from 18 to 20 per cent. Of course, it was notorious that the price of wheat had fallen from 30 to 40 per cent; but in Ireland the area of land which produced flax was very nearly as large as the area that produced wheat; and the average fall in the price of flax since 1881 was from 18 to 20 per cent. The reduction made by judicial rents since 1881 up to January 5 this year had been 18·13 per cent; but there had been a fall in rents prior to 1881, whereas the fall in prices was since then; while in the three preceding years, 1878 to 1881, prices were higher than they were in 1881. It was illogical and inaccurate to say that it was owing to the fall in the price of agricultural produce that great difficulty would be experienced in the payment of rents. He granted that the difficulty would be experienced; but it ought not to be connected entirely or mainly with the fall since 1881 in agricultural produce. It was not a question of rent alone in Ireland, or even in England. In many instances in Ireland if the tenants had the land for nothing they could not make a decent living out of land parcelled out into such minute holdings. It was the system of land tenure, and not the rent of the land, that was at fault. As long as it was supposed to be the rent which ground down the people, so long would attention be diverted from the real remedy. In Ireland there were 79,000 tenancies under five acres, 161,000 under 10 acres, and 226,000 under 15 acres. Of the holdings under five acres many were even under three acres. It was absolutely impossible for a man with a family to live out of three acres of the poorest land. It was not alone that economical conditions were different from what they were years ago; but the condition of the peasants of Ireland placed them at a disadvantage as compared with the peasants of Europe. Comparisons had been made between the peasants of Berne and those of Ireland. The peasant girls of Berne were trained to dairy farming, and the children of Berne acquired technical knowledge at school. Kindred advantages in Ireland would do something to relieve its depressed condition. Could any proposition be more dangerous, and, at the same time, more illogical than that contained in the second sentence of the Amendment, which declared that evictions confiscating rights would cause suffering, and endanger the maintenance of social order? He could not understand how evictions could confiscate rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act. If the rights were vested in them, no eviction could confiscate them. A man did not lose his rights by being turned out of doors. If a right were vested in him eviction could not deprive him of it. As to the third sentence of the Amendment, no proposal had been made to transfer the loss arising from the inability of tenants to pay rents from landowners to taxpayers. An attempt had been made to fasten upon words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer a meaning which they would not bear. Land tenure had been put before the House as a political question and as an agrarian question; but it was neither the one nor the other. It might be made political in the same way that any other question was. There was nothing in it that was agrarian, except in so far as the word agrarian implied connection with land. But there was much in the Land Question that was economical. There was much the House had done by which this economical difficulty had been produced. The Land Act of 1881 was the greatest breach of all economical traditions. The fact was they were suffering now from past legislation, and they were asked to repeat that mistake. They were asked to step in again, and to stay evictions and fix rents, not for 15 years, but for three years. The only effect of such policy would be to prevent capital being applied to the land. To embark on a continued course of interference with the relations between Irish landlords and tenants, and to persevere again in the policy on which Parliament erroneously entered into in 1881, would be a fatal step for the House of Commons to take. It had been erroneously said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had endeavoured to urge the Irish landlords to exact the last pound of rent. He (Mr. Cohen) did not think it was the province of statesmen to urge payment on one side or abatement on the other, but to deal with the subject in a judicial spirit. The hon. Member for Cork had alluded to the payment of rents being exacted by a system of Russian coercion. But there was in Ireland a coercion worse than even Russian—and that was the coercion of the National League. [Home Rule laughter.] They had an illustration of its power and tyranny in that House, where statements and arguments were met by mechanical laughter. In conclusion, he trusted they had come to the end of the period of mismanagement, and that the House would promote the real welfare of Ireland by supporting the well-considered measures shadowed forth by the Government, which were calculated to raise the condition of the Irish people.

Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox), said, that as a Liberal Unionist, he had the greatest possible sympathy with the Irish tenants in regard to their holdings. If, as no doubt was the case in England, the farmers were not able to pay their rents, they might fairly assume that much more so was that the case in Ireland, where they had a population depending almost entirely upon agricultural labour. The circumstances of England and Ireland differed in this respect—that in England, and also in Scotland, the agriculturists in addition to their own labour had the advantage of manufactures. In Ireland, they had not this advantage to the same extent, and the result was that the agriculturist in Ireland was entirely dependent upon the land for the upbringing of his family. Having this sympathy with the Irish tenant, he thought the scope of the Commission was too narrow, as he thought it should be extended so as to inquire into the extent and size of the holding; because it made no difference how small the rent might be, if the amount of land upon which the tenant laboured was too small to bring up his family. Therefore, the size of the holding was as important, if not more important, than the amount of rent, and the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to include this in the terms of the Inquiry. Whilst they greatly sympathized with the Irish people, they must nevertheless look at matters as they stood. When the present Government came into Office they found the rent was fixed by Act of Parliament passed by the Liberal Party, and if there ever was an obligation that was to be presumed to have been fair, it was the rent fixed by the Act of 1881. It therefore came to this, were the Government going to see that legal obligations, which had been fixed as right and proper by Act of Parliament, were to be carried out? If legal obligations undertaken under the Act of 1881 were not to be enforced, then what security had the country that, under the Land Purchase Act of the late Government, the rent fixed by that Act would not equally have been repudiated? The prosperity of the country depended upon its ability to enforce and recognize these legal obligations; and if they once destroyed confidence in this direction, the country was bound to go down, and they would soon have no security at all. He admitted there were cases of hardship in regard to the Irish tenant; but had they not cases of hardship in other matters of contract than those relating to landlord and tenant? Had they not banks, where innocent widows and orphans had been brought to starvation by the failure of the banks? And yet the Executive were never appealed to to interfere in their behalf; and in these cases it really amounted to eviction, for, in many cases, even the household furniture was sold off. Were they to interfere in these cases also? Whilst they must acknowledge and might regret the hardships of the law, there was no doubt that the security of the State depended upon maintaining the law, and enforcing just and legal obligations. That being so, he held that the Government coming into power, at the time they did, should give no countenance to any doctrines that did not enforce legal obligations; and surely if ever there was a legal obligation that ought to be enforced it was that entered into under the responsibility of an Act of Parliament. The legal obligation was not of their making; it was the making of the Liberal Party, and it was acknowledged to be just by them in every particular. Reference had been made to the matter of the reduction of rents in England and the generosity of landlords on the Treasury Bench. In the latter instance, the reduction of rents was the result of voluntary action on the part of the landlords; but if these gentlemen had come to the Executive and said—"We wish the legal obligation enforced," the Government of the country must have enforced it here as well as in Ireland. Instead of adopting that course, however, the landlords took the matter into their own hands, and gave the reduction of rent as a matter of generosity to the tenants. What, then, was the distinction between the two cases? It was this—the tenants in Ireland had no legal right, as some maintained they had, to ask Parliament to interfere with the settlement of the Land Act of 1881. They might have a moral right to ask the landlords to make a reduction in the rent; and if they so approached the landlords, he hoped the landlords would meet them in a generous spirit. But, by the teaching that had sprung up, these tenants were not taught to go, as they were in duty bound to go, in the spirit of asking a favour from their landlords, and of receiving a reduction in the same way as that reduction was received in England and Scotland. They were led to believe that they had a legal right, with regard to which this House could interfere, to prevent the landlords from receiving almost any rent at all, whether the land could pay it or not. It seemed to him, therefore, that the Government might have been in the position of saying, strictly and honourably, that they would adhere to the terms of the Act of 1881; but they had gone a little further than that, and had adopted a more generous view—they had said they would inquire into the Act of 1881, and see whether anything could be done for these tenants or not. That, he said, was a concession on the part of the Government which they were not bound to have made, but having made it, it should be generously received, and generously acknowledged. The terms of the inquiry had been explained. If the Government were going to alter the terms of an Act of Parliament, they were bound to take the utmost care by inquiry, before resorting to any change, and that was exactly what the Government proposed to do by the Commission to be issued. The Government did not commit themselves to anything; but they proposed to inquire into whether there were any grounds existing for the change. He was astonished that the debate should proceed upon the supposition that the Government were about to bring forward any scheme of Land Purchase; he thought it irrelevant to go into the question, as there was no such thing referred to in the Queen's Speech, nor in the proposals before the House at the present moment; and it was, therefore, altogether out of Order to be discussing a Land Purchase Bill which was not before the House, and which, according to any information they had from the Government, would not be before the House until the end of next spring, if it was even then. With regard to the first portion of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), the House had no information regarding the fact there stated, and could not of their own knowledge, as a Legislative Assembly, affirm an assertion such as that. With regard to the second part of the Amendment, which dealt with possible numerous evictions, they had no information as to what might take place; and as to the last part of the Amendment, deprecating the loss likely to arise to the taxpayer by the purchase of land from the owners, they had no such proposal before the House, and, therefore, he failed to see how they could deprecate that which was not before them. Under these circumstances, he thought it was his duty to state that, whilst he had the greatest possible sympathy for the Irish tenants, and should like to see the Commission extended in the direction he had indicated, he held that the House was bound to support the legal obligations undertaken by Act of Parliament; and that, if it did interfere with these legal obligations, it was bound to do so with the greatest possible caution, and that the Government, after inquiry, would have to consider how far it could interfere with vested interests conferred by Act of Parliament.

Mr. MASON (Lanark, Mid.) said, the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Caldwell) had treated them to a view of the question very much from a legal stand point of view. This, however, was a question of practical importance, affecting the well being of a great many of our fellow-subjects in Ireland, and as necessity had no law he was afraid they must deal with it in a very different way than looking at it from a legal point of view; and as Parliament had made the law of which they complained, Parliament was perfectly entitled to take steps to amend the law. That, he thought, was a view of the case that would commend itself not only to the House, but to the country. He presumed he was precluded from making any general remarks on the Queen's Speech; but he might be at liberty to make some remarks on the development of the policy which had been divulged by those who had spoken upon the Ministerial side of the House explanatory of the Speech from the Throne. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, he would endeavour to keep within the limits as much as possible. The speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave them a view of what the Government intended to do with regard to Ireland, and then they had a very full commentary upon the Speech from the Throne in "another place," to which, however, he would not further allude. They also had had a speech from the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and one from the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), who seemed to have inspired the whole matter. It was quite clear that from his speech last night the policy of the Government had very largely emanated, and he tried to explain away that by stating that the policy was not yet before the House in the shape of a Bill, so that there was plenty of time to discuss it when it came before the House. Although the Liberal Party were in a minority in the House, yet, with the aid of the country, he believed they would be able to prevent that policy ever becoming an Act, if ever it should get the length of being embodied in a Bill. They would contest it inch by inch, the policy being that they should pay a rent out of the taxpayers' pockets to the landlords of Ireland. [Cries of "No, no!"] That seemed to him to be the policy foreshadowed by Her Majesty's Ministry, and he was satisfied that the Liberal Party would be backed up by the country in resisting it to the uttermost. Scottish Members had not much to do with that debate; but representing an industrial and commercial constituency in Lanarkshire, the most important county in Scotland, he intended to enter his protest against the policy that had been foreshadowed by Her Majesty's Ministers. What was that policy? First, it was one of social order, and the whole of these measures the Government were about to introduce were intended to produce a better state of social order in Ireland. He was afraid the Government were going to give Ireland a bribe, and perhaps, also, another taste of coercion; but he thought they had already had enough of coercion. What they wanted was, neither bribery nor coercion, but a policy of conciliation.

Mr. GENT-DAVIS (Lambeth, Kennington), rising to Order, said, he wished to ask if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was still before the House, and if the indulgence granted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was to be extended to private Members?

Mr. SPEAKER: No question arises as to whether the indulgence of the House is to be granted to any hon. Member; but it is my duty to remind the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mason) that, while indulgence was extended to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the hon. Member himself is not confining himself to the subject before the House, which is, the inability of the tenants to pay rents, and the consequences following thereon.

MR. MASON said, he thought the question of social order was raised under the Amendment, but he bowed to the Chair on the question, and he would confine himself to the question before the House. The question of judicial rents had been raised in consequence of the Irish Land Act of 1881 having fixed the rent for 15 years. That appeared to him at the time to be a blunder, and experience had proved it to be so. As he understood it, they were fixed in 1881 on a basis of the value of produce for the five years preceding. If, then, the value of produce had since fallen 20, 30, or 50 per cent, it was quite clear that rents must now be too high for the people to pay. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be well if the Commission which the Government proposed to appoint would proceed to work at once. Rents were payable in November, and evictions were already going on. That being so, it seemed only just and proper that Parliament should interfere to amend the Act of 1881, that Act having failed by not making provision for such a fall as had taken place. He thought it would be wise for the Government to follow up the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork, and act promptly with regard to the reconsideration of rents in Ireland. They should send out one of their Commissions immediately, to ascertain what was the actual fall in the price of produce during the last five years. He was sure that if it were found desirable to pass any Act to amend the Land Act of 1881, the House would really do so, and the result might be to prevent a winter of trial and suffering to many of the people of Ireland, and at the same time do a great deal towards preserving social order in that country. That was his practical suggestion, and he would only add that he thought the Amendment which had been proposed by the hon. Member for Cork was wise and well-timed, and he intended, on a division, to give his vote in its favour.

Mr. Speaker

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Skefford) said, he felt bound to preface the observations he wished to make by saying that the practice of allowing speeches to be made by any Member of the House, however distinguished or illustrious, to which no other Members could be permitted to reply without being out of Order, appeared to be inconvenient in the extreme. He desired to limit his observations to the Amendment before the House, and if by any mishap he should travel beyond its scope, he hoped he would receive not less indulgence than was accorded to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in the long and discursive, and in some respects thoroughly mischievous, speech which he delivered that afternoon. One thing had been too much lost sight of in connection with all their discussion about Ireland; but it had been made perfectly clear by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, and that was that, although, no doubt, the hon. Member was using them for his own political purposes, the causes which lay at the root of all their troubles and difficulties in Ireland were economical rather than political in their character. For that reason, although it met with so much ridicule and opposition from the Opposition side of the House, there was no part of the policy of the Government which commended itself more to his mind than that in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer disclosed the intention and desire of the Government to deal with the question of the development of the material resources of Ireland. The Amendment dealt specifically with two questions—social order and the Land Question. The chief difficulty in Ireland now, as for many years past, was the Land Question. The right hon. Member for Derby had told the House that it was hopeless ever to think of dealing with that question unless they first discovered what was the real evil afflicting the country. He should have thought the right hon. Gentleman might have known what the real evil was. It was that over a large part of the country there was scarcely any means of subsistence for the population apart from the land, and in consequence there had always been an excessive and unnatural demand for its possession. It had been summed up over and over again in debates in that House, and had once been described as "the cancer of the country." It was, and would continue to be, a fruitful source of trouble, unless some means were found of lessening it. If the result of the labours of the smaller Commission promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer should result in the production of some effectual measures in the direction of encountering that evil, if it should be the means of diverting the attention of any part of the population from the soil and of providing the people with other means of subsistence, it would do more to mitigate and remove the real evil in the country than could be done by any other means that it would be possible for human ingenuity to devise. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had spoken at some length upon the question of rents in Ireland that night, and for his (Mr. Chaplin's) own part he could say that in his humble opinion there was no other man in this country who was so responsible for the present situation with regard to rents, and with regard to the present situation of the Land Question altogether, as the right hon. Gentleman. With all his influence, all his authority, and all the unrivalled power which he had exercised in the House of Commons for so many years, the right hon. Gentleman had never, so far as he could remember, raised a little finger to do anything at all towards attempting to deal with that question, with the exception of two miserable clauses in the Land Act of 1881—one dealing with the question of emigration, and the other with the reclamation of land—both of which had been dealt with in so feeble and ineffectual a manner that he believed he was right in saying that from that moment to this they had remained a dead letter. He remembered that in 1870, when the right hon. Gentleman had introduced his first great Irish Land Bill to the House, the right hon. Gentleman had said—"We take the circumstances and the conditions of Ireland as we find them." Yes; and it was precisely because the right hon. Gentleman had done so—because he took them as he found them, and because he had left them as he found them—that the circumstances and conditions of Ireland had been far more potent than the measures of the right hon. Gentleman, and had vitiated and rendered futile all his great legislative measures. What were those circumstances and conditions? They were perfectly notorious. They were to be found in the miserable condition of the people, especially in the West of Ireland, who were crowded together upon holdings which in a good year were hardly able to afford the means of a miserable subsistence, and which in a bad year meant misery and starvation. The right hon. Gentleman, instead of doing, or attempting to do, anything with this state of things, had confined his attention entirely to the property of one class in Ireland—a class which was numerically small, and which was insufficiently represented in that House—and he had thought that by a sweeping confiscation of their property, and by transferring it to others, he would accomplish the regeneration of Ireland. This policy he had carried out in spite of all protests, with consequences and results which were patent to the world to-day. Among those results was the system of judicial rents, which had been the subject of so much discussion that afternoon. He remembered that in 1870 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had denounced that system, and had proved to demonstration that it could only end in one thing—namely, the complete demoralization of the people of that country. But afterwards, in 1881, the right hon. Gentleman had suddenly found that it was a panacea for all the evils and mischief in Ireland. That system had now completely broken down. Anyone who had viewed the system candidly and without bigotry or ignorance must have seen—and as he always had prophesied—that it must break down. Then the ridiculous pretence was put forward that the coming fall in prices—which had been in everybody's mouth at that time—had never been taken into account by the Commissioners in fixing the judicial rents, and was never contemplated at all by anyone. Why, he himself recollected hearing debates in that House in the year 1881 over and over again—and in which he had taken a considerable part—on the question of the probable fall in agricultural prices; and all the results which would follow from it had been put prominently forward. He had himself moved an Amendment having reference to those very subjects, and had stated his opinion that this constituted a fatal blot in the scheme. That opinion had then been scouted and repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) the other night had made very merry about the number of Commissions now being proposed to be appointed by the Conservative Government. For his own part, he (Mr. Chaplin) had not a single word to say against those Commissions; on the contrary, if the Government required more information than they had at present, it was not only their right but their duty to appoint them. But he would remind the House that there had been a good many Commissions already upon these and upon cognate subjects, and that vast stores of information were already at the disposal of the Government and of the House. A Commission appointed three years before under the Duke of Richmond had reported in 1881 upon the whole question of agricultural distress in Ireland. That Commission had been appointed by Lord Beaconsfield; but in the same year—1881—a Commission had been appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, known as the Beesborough Commission, which had also reported on the condition of Ireland, and especially upon the working of the Land Act of 1870. Besides these a Committee of the House of Lords had since then inquired into the working of the Land Act of 1881. He wished to remind the House of one or two passages from those Reports, because they bore upon the question of the fall in prices and judicial rents, and whether or not that fall in prices had been taken into account by the Commissioners. The Richmond Commission had reported that, in common with the rest of the United Kingdom, the agricultural depression of the years 1877, 1878, and 1879 had greatly affected Ireland, and that the effect had been increased in Ireland by the absence of manufacturing interests and other sources of employment; that undoubtedly the depression had fallen with extreme severity upon the smaller farmers and small holders in the West of Ireland; and that they were satisfied that, with the slightest failure of the crop of these people, they would be unable to subsist on the produce of their farms even if they paid no rent at all. It made no difference whether the failure was in the crops or in the prices, and this Report showed that that there was evidence which must have led the Commissioners to take these matters into account. But in the Report of the Beesborough Commission there was much stronger evidence to this effect, and the principle of the Act of 1881, which had created these Commissioners, had been framed to a very large extent upon the Report and recommendations of that Commission. In their Report they had expressly referred to the question of future variations in the price of agricultural produce as affecting the length of time for which rent should be fixed. In the face of such evidence he would ask how it was possible to contend that judicial rents had been fixed in the past by the Commissioners without taking into account any probable fall in prices? The Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1881 were supposed to be men not merely of ordinary common sense but of exceptional ability, and yet now the hon. Member for Cork told them that they had taken no consideration of these Reports. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had taken the Chancellor of the Exchequer considerably to task for some language which he had used in the opening night of the debate, and had said that the speech of the noble Lord was not only a direct encouragement to evictions, but was a direct discouragement to any remissions of rent. For his (Mr. Chaplin's) own part, he thought that was a totally false construction of the speech of his noble Friend, and one which was not in any way warranted by what had been said. What the noble Lord had said was, that if the rents could not be paid then the landlord was entitled to the restoration of his land. A contrast had been drawn to-day by the hon. Member for Cork between the practice in England and the practice in Ireland, and said that they should follow the practice adopted in England between landlords and tenants when the latter got into difficulties. But great difference in practice was one of the mischievous results which followed from the Land Act of 1881, and which had been always foreseen and predicted. They should remember that measure destroyed all the old, what were sometimes called the "feudal," but what he believed were the kindly relations which existed between the vast majority of the landlords and tenants in Ireland. He was not going to defend all the landlords in Ireland; they knew very well there were black sheep in every flock; but would the hon. Member for Cork tell him that it was not the old landlords who were looked up to and revered, and that it was not the new landlords who had been guilty of many of the evil deeds he so frequently denounced? By that Act hon. Gentlemen destroyed all those kindly relations for the future and placed their countrymen on a strictly legal and commercial footing, and they made it their boast at the time that they had done so. Therefore the burden of the care of those poor impoverished people ought to fall, not upon the landlords, but upon the shoulders of those who had brought such a state of things about. When the Act of 1881 was passed a solemn binding contract was entered into between the State on the one hand and the landlords and tenants on the other. He did not mean that the State guaranteed that the landlords should always receive the full judicial rent; but it distinctly guaranteed him two things—first, that until the expiration of the statutory term there should be no interference with the judicial rent so far as the action of the State was concerned; and, secondly, that if from any cause the judicial rent should not be paid the landlord should be restored to the use of the land which belonged to him. That was a distinct obligation of honour and good faith between the State on the one hand and the two contracting parties on the other; and if he had to choose between honour and good faith and the spoliation of the landlords, he could not depart from the obligations of honour and good faith, even if he was left no other alternative than that the Irish tenants should be evicted, or that the burden of purchase should be placed upon the shoulders of the State. He regretted it exceedingly, but the fault lay not with hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, but with the authors of the measure. The present state of things was the first chapter in the lesson which he suspected vast numbers of the English people had yet to learn—namely, that their admiration, their worship, and their blind support in all his foolish measures for many years past of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was going to turn out, in the long run, the most expensive luxury that ever was indulged in by any people in any country in the world. The hon. Member for Cork concluded what had been described to-night as an “impressive and cold-blooded speech” by a suggestion which he desired to notice. He proposed that the whole of the judicial rents in Ireland should be revised, and the statutory period reduced from 15 years to three. Had the hon. Member forgotten the number of years that were taken to fix the judicial rents in force at present? If he had not, he would have known that his proposition was totally impracticable. Unless he was misinformed, there were at the present moment 4,000 applications for judicial rents which were in arrear; and yet the hon. Member was good enough to suggest and recommend to the Government that the whole of the judicial rents in Ireland should be revised, and that was to be accomplished before November next. [MR. PARNELL: Upon the basis of prices.] There was no official record of agricultural prices, so far as he (Mr. Chaplin) knew; and, if that was so, that made the hon. Member's position worse than it was before. He did not wish to delay the House. He only desired to make one observation more. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman contemplated further disorders in Ireland; and he gathered from the hon. Member that he endorsed the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian as to the imprudence of postponing the next Session until February instead of holding it in the autumn. Well, he confessed that at one time he had some considerable misgivings on that subject himself. But whatever doubts he had entertained were dispelled by the clear, able, and conclusive speech which fell from his noble Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the opening night of the debate. He ventured to offer his hearty and sincere congratulations to his noble Friend on the statement which he made on that occasion, and also, if he might be allowed to do so without being chargeable with undue presumption, on his having attained the distinguished position in which it became his duty to deliver it. One thing, at all events, was made perfectly clear by the statement which the noble Lord delivered—that Her Majesty's Government most certainly did not underrate the importance of the question of social order and the means of restoring and maintaining it in Ireland. For they announced their determination to leave absolutely nothing undone, within the resources of the ordinary law, to restore it. And, more than that, his noble Friend gave the House and the country a plain and specific pledge that if by any mishap the Government found the ordinary law unequal to the task, and failed them, then they should not hesitate to summon Parliament together without delay and ask for further powers. To this, at least, his noble Friend said he could pledge the Government—that the very moment they became conscious of their inability to perform the first duty of a Government—namely, to enforce the law—at that moment they would call Parliament together, and ask with confidence for whatever measures they might deem necessary. Nothing could be more emphatic than that declaration, and it ought to dispel any anxiety with regard to the upholding of the law in Ireland. He might not, he supposed, say a few words upon the general policy of the Government; but with the indulgence of the House he would ask to be allowed to say that, on the whole, he cordially approved and endorsed the policy indicated in the speech of his noble Friend. There was one point, however, on which, he was sorry to say, he differed altogether from the Government. He differed in the views which his noble Friend announced with regard to the extension of a large scheme of local government to Ireland concurrently with England, when Parliament met in February. But he would not dwell upon that question now, because there would be many opportunities of doing so when the measures of the Government were before the House. Hon. Members from Ireland had been exceedingly courteous to him on this occasion, and he would conclude with one word of appeal to them. The hon. Member for Cork had told the House that he did not regard the late decision of the country as conclusive in any degree. How could the hon. Member and his Friends ever hope to fight the question under more favourable auspices? They had fought it under the most powerful and most popular statesman the country had seen for years. More than that, they had appealed to an electorate which had just been enormously enlarged by the same right hon. Gentleman, and in whose favour, by every sense of gratitude and interest, that electorate was likely to be prejudiced rather than the reverse. But, notwithstanding all that, no question was ever decided in a more complete and emphatic manner, and it was decided against them.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) rose to a point of Order. He said he had been stopped in his remarks, and had been called to Order for discussing the general question; and the right hon. Gentleman ought not to be allowed to go beyond the discussion of the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER said, that he was the judge of Order in that House; and he would call any hon. Member to Order if occasion required. He must be allowed to say that, although, certainly, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman had no immediate connection with the Amendment, yet he understood the right hon. Gentleman was about to conclude his remarks; and, therefore, he (Mr. Speaker) did not interpose.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he would best consult the convenience of the House and the propriety of the situation if he should conclude by one word of appeal to the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends, and it was this. After all Ireland had gone through, after all the trouble she had endured for many years, after the decided verdict which had been given at the General Election, was it not evident to them that it would be for the welfare and the prosperity of Ireland that they should let that unhappy country have, at least, an interval of peace?

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I hope, Sir, that in speaking for the first time I may receive from the House, as a whole, as much kindness as I have received from individual Members, of all shades of opinion, when making my way through the House. In regard to the present debate, I think the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) may fairly be called the Cassandra of Irish politics. Again and again he has told English Governments what he knows about the state of Ireland; what he believes will be the proper course to pursue, in order to restore peace and order in that country, and what the consequences will be if his advice is disregarded. Yet over and over again the hon. Gentleman has been told that his knowledge is of no account; that his advice will not be listened to, and that his prophecies are all wrong. But, Sir, in spite of all that the time will come when English Governments will discover that the advice tendered to them was not so bad, and the prophecies not so foolish, as they, in their arrogance and self-conceit, suppose. The hon. Gentleman has suggested certain changes which he thinks will, in some measure, tide the Government over their present difficulties. One of his suggestions is that the judicial rents should be fixed for three years; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin), who has just sat down, says that this would take a great deal of time, and when he is reminded by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork that he has said "on the basis of prices," the right hon. Gentleman says there is no authentic source from which the basis of prices can be ascertained. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman has ever heard of Thom's Almanack; whether he knows that there is any such person as Thom; that there is such a publication as Thom's Almanack; that, as a matter of fact, Thom is the Queen's printer in Ireland; and that the information which he supplies to the public is of the most authentic character? Then the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork says that leaseholders ought to be included within the benefits of the Act. Well, I scarcely think that any Member of this House will regard that as a very foolish suggestion on the part of the hon. Gentleman in the face of the fact that the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh Colonel Saunderson; and the hon. Member for South Tyrone Mr. T. W. Russell; have introduced a Bill with the very object of including leaseholders in the benefits of the Act. Therefore, I take it for granted that no one will regard the proposal of my hon. Friend as absurd and extravagant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works Mr. Plunket told the House to-night that the hon. Member for Cork had drawn a fearful picture in those cold-blooded tones to which the House is so much accustomed. Well, I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot have a particularly good ear; for I venture to think—and I believe my ear is tolerably good—that I have never in my life heard words spoken in a tone which implied more deep concern than those which were spoken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork. We in this part of the House do not find the hon. Gentleman cold-blooded; but then we are only his followers and friends. We think we know him; we are sure that you do not. I shall keep, Sir, in the few observations I propose to address to the House, very closely to the terms of the Amendment, as I am very anxious—and I hope I shall always be so—to obey implicitly the ruling of the Chair. The Amendment, as I understand it, deals with four principal questions—judicial rents, evictions, social order, and the land proposals of the Government. Now, with regard to judicial rents, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down declared that they were fixed by the same Commissioners who were the authors of the Bessborough Report. [Mr. CHAPLIN: No.] I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon if I am misrepresenting what he said.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): What I said was, that provision was made for them by the Land Act of 1881.

Mr. W. A. MACDONALD: I am quite aware that the Commissioners were appointed in pursuance of the Act of 1881; but it does not follow that as there were different Commissioners, and as the rents were fixed by a number of Sub-Commissioners who were different persons altogether, that, therefore, every word contained in the Report of the Bessborough Commission was carried out. The truth is that those of the Sub-Commissioners who were particularly friendly to the tenants were either dismissed or not re-appointed; and the Sub-Commissioners in general fixed the judicial rents, not according to any defined or well-understood principle, but according to the political exigencies of the time. At the time they were first appointed Ireland was in a state of tremendous agitation; it had just been passing through the most terrible crisis it has passed through in our day; and as a consequence, because there was this outcry, the judicial rents were pulled down considerably. But, as time went on, I think I am correct in saying—although if I had time

I should prefer to quote the Reports which the Commissioners have published year after year—the abatements in the rents became less, because the country was more quiet. In regard to the fall in prices I say—and I defy any hon. Member on the other side of the House to disprove my assertion—that the Sub-Commissioners did not take into account the permanent fall in the price of agricultural produce to the extent which they ought to have done. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) asks whether the House can believe that the Sub-Commissioners could have fixed the rents without considering the bad years? Now, the right hon. Gentleman has a singular faculty for misconceiving the point of his opponent's argument. No one on these Benches ever stated that the Sub-Commissioners had disregarded bad years. What we did say was that that which was patent to all the world was neglected by the Sub-Commissioners—namely, that the foreign competition—the competition of American and Australian produce—was not likely to get less, and that instead of standing still it was calculated to increase as the facilities of intercommunication increased, and that with that increase of facilities the fall of prices would continue, and so there would be brought about, as a necessary consequence, a further inability on the part of the tenants to pay rents. We maintain that these things ought to have been taken into account by the Sub-Commissioners. But we are told that the judicial rents are to be enforced in full, and that they are to be enforced with all the power of the law, because the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who opened the debate on the part of Her Majesty's Government, does not believe the statement as to the tenants being unable to pay the judicial rents. Well, Sir, we do not know how the noble Lord arrived at that conclusion. I am afraid that he arrived at it in virtue of that faculty of intuitive knowledge which he so modestly disclaims for himself and his Colleagues. Certainly, the authorities are all the other way; but then they are authorities who only profess to base their opinion on facts and experience; and we all know, of course, that intuition is higher than either. The authority of Sir James Caird has been quoted; but it has been said that Sir

James Caird, in a subsequent letter to The Times, explained that he had been misinformed, and that he was misunderstood. Now, I maintain that no words could have been plainer than those which were written by Sir James Caird—namely, that from 538,000 holdings in Ireland all economic rent had for the present disappeared. These words are plain enough to anyone who knows anything of political economy, although, perhaps, there are some hon. Members on the other side of the House who do not know very much about political economy. All I can say of the words of Sir James Caird is that if these words are not clear and plain they have certainly been used for the purpose of concealing his thoughts. Then there is another authority I do not think the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer will feel disposed entirely to dispute—I mean Dr. Walsh, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. Dr. Walsh says that he looks with the gravest apprehension to the coming winter in Ireland; and he endorses the opinion, so freely expressed in other quarters, as to the inability of the people to pay the judicial rents in full. ["Oh, oh!"] Will any hon. Member venture to affirm that Dr. Walsh, with his episcopal authority, would state a fact like that, or be a party to any assertion which did not appear to him to be clearly true? [Renewed cries of "Oh!"] I am sorry to hear that mark of disapproval from that side of the House. I am myself an Irish Protestant; but I have learned to respect the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, and the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland; and I may tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that if they only knew Ireland one-thousandth part as well as these gentlemen know it there would be a much better chance that they would be able to govern it. Judicial rents are to be enforced to the full, and the enforcement is to be carried out by all the power of the Crown. Well, Sir, I say that as sure as the sun will rise tomorrow, so sure, when the judicial rents are thus enforced, will there be crime in Ireland. There must be crime in Ireland, because of the record which the Irish landlords have in the past, and because of the terrible consequences which must result to the tenants if these evictions are carried out. We have been told by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works that evictions are becoming fewer in Ireland; and in proof of that assertion he has quoted some authority or document, which he does not exactly define, which is a year old, and which, as far as I can make out, is a document which has never been laid on the Table of this House. Sir, has the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and have Her Majesty's Government, read of the evictions in Gweedore last week? Do they know anything about those evictions? Do they know anything whatever about Gweedore? Probably a good many of them never heard that such a place existed. I, however, have visited it; and I know Gweedore well. I can assure hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that there is such a place, and that the parish priest of Gweedore is a clergyman whose name is held in honour in every cabin in Donegal. I can also testify to the industry of the people of the district, who go every summer to Scotland in order to try and earn enough to pay the miserable rent that is due to the exacting landlord. They are honest; they are industrious; and, so far, there has been no crime among them. The land which they occupy is of the most miserable kind, consisting of stones and rocks, interspersed with little patches of clay upon which the people plant their potatoes and oats, which are the only means they have of subsistence, except what they earn by working in other countries. These are the people whom the landlords have been evicting; and it is scenes like these, in every part of Ireland, which your policy will protect. Sir, we have heard of the desperate condition of the county of Kerry. I know Kerry. I visited it in 1883; and what did I find there? I found a gentleman, whose name has been more than once quoted in these debates—Mr. Hussey, who was formerly the agent of Lord Kenmare and of a number of other gentlemen having property in the locality, who thought him an exceedingly efficient agent. But he carried out his work with very little regard for the feelings of the people. I was assured that not only had Mr. Hussey, the land agent of Lord Kenmare, put the people out upon the roadside—men, women, and children—to perish, or take refuge in the workhouse or in an emigrant ship, but, as if to make the cup of their misery overflow, he actually burned their cabins to the ground after he had turned them out upon the roadside. [Laughter.] Sir, any man who can laugh at that must have the heart of a stone. Are these the scenes hon. Members opposite desire to see in every part of Ireland?—for if the policy of Her Majesty's Government be carried out they are certainly the scenes you will see. And do you suppose that such scenes can pass off without outrages and crime? I am satisfied that if one-half of the tyranny were exercised by the landlords of England that is exercised by the landlords in Ireland the people would long since have risen as one man, and got rid of the whole squad of landlords. No, Sir; there will be crime as a result of these evictions; and how do you propose to deal with the question of social order? You propose to deal with it entirely by itself. I should have thought you had had enough experience of the folly and absurdity of a course like that. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) told us the other night something about the absurdity of this policy of treating the question of social order by itself. He did not quote—possibly he could hardly have been expected to quote that, which there will be no impropriety if I quote—namely, a precedent in recent Irish history, which must be fresh in the knowledge of hon. Members, and which most conclusively proves my point—I mean the case of Earl Spencer. Earl Spencer governed Ireland from May, 1882, until February or March, 1885. When he entered upon that task he had an advantage, from your point of view, which you are not likely to possess again. Public opinion had been so outraged by the Phoenix Park assassinations that the House of Commons was willing to give the noble Earl very exceptional powers by passing such a Coercion Act as had been unknown during this generation. Earl Spencer was empowered to prevent the reading and circulation of all American newspapers in Ireland. He could stop public meetings; he could allow juries to be packed; he could change the venue to such an extent that Irish-speaking peasants from Connemara could be tried in Dublin by people who did not know one single word of their language. He could do this, and he could do a great deal more; and he did it. And what was the result? You say that he restored social order. Everybody knows, as was publicly stated by Lord Monteagle in a letter to one of the London journals, that at the time when that coercion reign of Earl Spencer came to an end England was hated in Ireland as she had never been hated before. Now, Sir, that is a very pertinent example for this House, and it bears most closely upon social order. Do you expect to succeed where Earl Spencer failed? If you do, you have a much better opinion of your own capacity than hon. Members on this side of the House entertain. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works said that the hon. Member for Cork had drawn a terrible picture. No doubt it was a terrible picture, and if it should come true it will not be through his doing, but yours. The hon. Member showed exactly how it will be brought about. First of all, you will insist upon carrying out the law to the full, and it is all to be done as a sacrifice to the delightful English fetish of law and order. That will be the first thing. There will then be evictions, and these evictions will be followed by crime. Her Majesty's Government will then come to this House and demand fresh powers. They will probably get them; a Coercion Act will follow. We (the Irish Members) will stand by our people, and the consequence will be that you will not distinguish between criminals and your political opponents; and so, ultimately, in order that your dark deeds may not be exposed by us on this side of the House, you will suspend the Constitutional rights of the Irish people, and govern Ireland like a Crown Colony. [Cries of "Question!"] That is what I maintain. Well, I do not know, of course, how far all that will happen; but I do know this—that the Conservatives in this House appear to consist of three classes; first of all, the Conservatives who mean kindly towards Ireland, and who acknowledge all the good qualities of the Irish people; secondly, those who take the very unjust view with respect to Ireland which is exhibited by hon. Gentlemen of the mental and moral calibre of the hon. Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool (Mr. W. F. Lawrence), who spoke the other night after the right hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley), the late Chief Secretary for Ireland; and, thirdly, there is another class to which Conservative Governments belong—men who shut their eyes and refuse to see what is patent to everybody else. I say that these things may come about, and it will, indeed, be a very terrible picture. But, Sir, if they do come about, there will be a streak of dawn after the night, and it will arise in this way. What do you suppose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne, or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, or the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) will be doing when Her Majesty's Government are thus violating the Constitution, and bringing all these measures to bear upon Ireland? [Cries of "Question!"] I believe I am speaking to the question, for I am dealing with the question of social order. What do you suppose these right hon. Gentlemen and those who sit on this side of the House will be doing while you are thus violating the Constitution? They will be carrying on the education of the masses of the English people; already something is beginning to be known of the abominations of English rule in Ireland—already something is beginning to be known, through the writings of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) and others, about the horrible acts of Irish landlordism; and the English people, knowing all this, will not long be satisfied to keep the present Administration in power.

MR. GENT-DAVIS (Lambeth, Kensington): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Member is speaking to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell)?

AN HON. MEMBER: You do not like to hear the truth.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member (Mr. Gent-Davis) will observe that in the Amendment the words "the maintenance of social order" appear. At the same time, I may remark that the mere existence of those words in the Amendment, taken with the context, do not raise the question of social order and make it the principal subject of discussion. The Main Question now before the House is the question of the eviction of Irish tenants, and the debate must be confined to that.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Well, Sir, I can only say that when the result shad-owed forth in the speech of the hon. Member for Cork is brought about these right hon. Gentlemen will not be idle, and the true character of your government will be patent to the people of England. And when that day arrives the present Administration will be hurled from Office amid ignominy and disgrace, because they will have brought shame upon the name of freedom-loving England, and because they will have proved their utter incapacity to govern Ireland at all.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Like the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Macdonald), I venture to make a very earnest appeal for that indulgence which this House always extends to a Member who rises to address it for the first time. The Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Cork

Mr. Parnell practically raises the question upon which my own election was carried in Tyrone. I cannot possibly give a silent vote upon it, and my sense of duty does not allow me to walk out of the House without giving a vote. I was returned for a typical agricultural constituency. I was sent to this House by the tenant farmers of South Tyrone. These men resisted every appeal to their cupidity that could be made; they threw aside the tempting creed of agrarian Socialism that was placed before them; and although, Sir, I am very reluctant to speak in this House during the first week of its meeting, I do not think that I should be justified in allowing the views and the feelings of the farmers of South Tyrone to pass without some explanation in this House. Sir, as regards the question of judicial rents I desire to put before the House the case which was put before myself by these farmers. I submit that the men who sent me here have no desire to rob any landlord, or any desire to confiscate any man's property. What they said to me during the contest amounted to this. The judicial rents were fixed in 1881, 1882, and 1883. Under the conditions then existing they were fair rents; and had those conditions remained intact we should have felt ourselves bound in honour to pay them without a murmur. But it is right I should inform the House that those conditions, in the opinion of my constituents, do not continue to exist. Butter, which is one of the staple commodities of Ireland, was 1s. per lb. in 1882; it is now selling in the Ulster markets at 6d. Stock brings only half the price it fetched in 1882 and 1883, while all other kinds of agricultural produce have suffered a like depreciation. My constituents were constantly assuring me throughout my contest that if that depreciation in agricultural produce was to continue the rent would become impossible of payment; and they would not be able, and they did not think they ought to be asked, to bear the entire burden. Sir, I desired to recognize the justice of the case as regarded both parties; and I said then to the tenant farmers, on a score of platforms, what I venture to repeat to this House now. These facts bring grave duties to the door of every Irish landlord. If the land does not produce the rent, the rent cannot be paid. But, Sir, I was always careful to tell my constituents what I fear that hon. Members below the Gangway are apt to forget—that if the landlord had grave duties corresponding duties lay on the tenant I told these men, as fairly and as squarely as I could, that while landlords were bound to consider the situation—and I know, of my own knowledge, that many of them have done so, and are ready to do it again—it was also the duty of the tenants, by the exercise of thrift, industry, skill, and sobriety, to do their share in the desperate circumstances in which they are placed. Now, Sir, that is the tenants' case; and let us hear, in all fairness, what the landlord has to say for himself. He has also a case. I heard the speech of the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Galway (Mr. Harris) the other night—and if that hon. Member can say it I think the entire Party can say it also—that it is not unjust for the landlord to look for his rent. The landlord's case is this—if a tenant complains to him, and he is a needy man—for all landlords are not rolling in wealth—he probably tells the tenant that he had nothing to do with the fixing of his rent; that that was taken out of his hands by the measure passed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone); that that rent was now fixed by a tribunal perfectly independent of him, the landlord.

[Fourth Night.]

The landlord would also, in all probability, remind the tenant of what is true at this moment, regarding the Province of Ulster at any rate—namely, that there is a promise, I am thankful to say, of a more than average harvest. [Cries of "No!" from the Home Rule Members.] Sir, I will admit the fall in prices; but I would ask the tenant, if the prices had gone up, would the landlords have been benefited during the existence of the judicial lease? I maintain that this House is bound to look at both sides of the question; and it would commit a very grave error, indeed, if it came to a decision on the mere statement of either one party or the other to the quarrel. The Government are face to face with a grave difficulty. They do not propose to shut the door in the tenant's face. If they did, I should vote with the hon. Member for Cork. They simply say that being called upon to undo a great national contract, solemnly entered into, they cannot do so without adequate inquiry into the facts of the case. Sir, I think they are right; and allow me to add this. This inquiry has been much ridiculed. Now, I venture to say that if we had had a little more inquiry lately and a little less haste in legislation, the Liberal Party would not have been in the state of confusion in which they find themselves to-day, and the country might have been spared the turmoil of a General Election, which it had no desire to engage in. Sir, the real question, to my mind, is this—do the Government mean business by this Commission? I am a young Member of this House. ["Hear, hear!" from the Home Rule Members.] Yes; but I have spent a great many years about these premises, and I candidly confess that I am very hostile to Royal Commissions and inquiries of this kind. They frequently mean delay, and they are very often floated for the mere purpose of shelving inconvenient questions. If I thought delay was possible in this case I should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. It is because I think the Government is bound to inquire—because I think there is a case for inquiry; and because I think they are honest in their determination to inquire, and to legislate, that I shall vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, if he carries it to a division. I do so because I think the Government entitled to time; because I think it more to the tenants' interest that an inquiry should be held; and because I desire to see the rents settled in the manner pointed out by the hon. Member for Cork on the basis of prices, and not by any rule of thumb in the Sub-Commissioners' Courts. Hon. Gentlemen have been talking here to-night about the principle adopted in a Land Court for the settlement of rents. Sir, there has been no principle whatever adopted—none; and I am satisfied that if any hon. Member were to go into the Court and ask any one of the Commissioners upon what principle he has acted in giving his decisions he would not get a rational answer to the question. Many of the Sub-Commissioners appointed under the Land Act were men who knew nothing about land at all. They went into the Court, and simply struck an all-round reduction of 23 or 24 per cent; and the consequence was that the good landlords—the men who had never raised their rents—were the very men who were punished severely. Landlords who had raised their rents within the last 12 or 15 years simply suffered the same reduction as other landlords who had not raised their rents for 50 or 60 years. I support Her Majesty's Government because I desire to see this inquiry undertaken, and because I desire also to see the leaseholders included in the Act of 1881. Why were they excluded? I do not think it is fair to found an impeachment against the Government upon that ground; because the main reason why the leaseholders, who number 100,000, and are composed of the very cream of the tenant farmers of Ireland, are outside the scope of the Land Act has been the persistent refusal of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), and right hon. Gentlemen acting with him on the Front Bench, to allow them to come in. I desire further to see the holders of town parks and the purchasers of glebe lands brought under the Act of 1881, so that they may share in the benefits which that Act confers. I therefore prefer taking my chance of the result of the proposed inquiry, with its possible effects upon the tenant, to voting for a mere empty Amendment for which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) himself declines to vote. I have no desire to occupy the attention of the House; but I wish to say that no matter what may be said about national sentiment—and everybody in this House knows the strength of that sentiment—the real question in Ireland—the question that goes down deep into Irish life, is the Land Question, and not the National Question. If Her Majesty's Government can do anything for the 120,000 small farmers who are starving in the West, and in the wilds of Donegal—if they can, by any development of Irish resources, take the pressure from the land and let something like daylight into the dismal cabins there, they will have done a service for which the country will be bound to speak them well. Sir, I shall vote for the Government all the more readily, because I do not enter this House as a partizan. I came to this House determined to vote as my conscience directed me, either for or against the Government.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid): You never had one.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has made use of a most improper and un-Parliamentary expression, which I must ask him at once to withdraw.

DR. TANNER: I beg to withdraw the remark.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Sir, I shall vote all the more readily with the Government on this question, because I believe that their programme is a wise one. They have undertaken to make a resolute effort to restore law and order in Ireland; and whether that effort is made in Belfast or in Kerry I am with them in the making of it, and I hope that they will resolutely adhere to the task they have undertaken. They have promised to consider various other matters going deep down into the condition of Ireland. I trust they will proceed resolutely, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left in what they consider to be the path of duty.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): As one of the Gentlemen who, for three years, served as an Assistant Commissioner under the Land Act, I may, perhaps, be allowed to claim the attention of the House for a short time. In November, 1881, I was offered an appointment under the Land Act, which I gladly accepted, because, at that time, I heartily approved of the action of the Liberal Government with reference to the Land Question in Ireland, and I felt grave doubts whether my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was fully justified in the opposition which he raised to the Government at that time. But, Sir, three years of hard work in connection with that Land Commission—three years spent in inquiry into the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland—have convinced me that my hon. Friend the Member for Cork was not only justified, but that his action was absolutely necessary. That is the reason why I now consider it an honour—and a very high honour—to belong to the Party which my hon. Friend so ably leads. The present Government, as I understand, take their stand on the Act of 1881. I have read, Sir, of a law which came from a higher source than even the law of this land; and I have read of a body of men who, while regarding literally and most exactly the letter of the law, managed so effectually to kill its spirit that they escaped from some of its most essential obligations. Sir, the spirit of the Act of 1881, if I understand that Act at all, is divided into three main principles. The landlord was not to have the power to demand from the tenant more than a fair rent, which rent was not to encroach upon the property of the tenant. So long as the landlord received such rent he was not to have the power of evicting the tenant. The third principle was that the tenant was to have the right to sell his interest in his holding. But, Sir, as regards the statutory term of 15 years, which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to consider such a sacred thing, I maintain that it was a mere accident of the Bill, and that it is in no way one of the principles of the Act. Then, if we can show that the maintenance of this mere accident would destroy the spirit of the Act, I think the Government must either abandon their present position, or else they will stand convicted of a desire to strangle the spirit of the law by a strict adherence to the letter. Now, as regards judicial rents, the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us he is not prepared to admit that they are too high, even under present circumstances; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant asks this question—“Can it be supposed that the Commissioners did not take into consideration any possible fall in prices?" Now, Sir, I am afraid that, unless they were inspired—and I, for one, was certainly not inspired—they could not possibly have foreseen the terrible state of depression which has overtaken the agricultural interest. What was the state of things when we began our work? We had passed through a period of great depression which culminated in the year 1879. From that time until the year 1882 things began gradually to improve, and in the year 1882 we had reached a year that was certainly very much better than the three or four preceding years, and unfortunately, as it has since turned out, very much better than the subsequent years. The period during which I took part in fixing the judicial rents extended to the year 1884, and I will take the liberty of comparing the prices of the six preceding years ending with 1884. I find that the prices of the six previous years were considerably higher. Butter was 20 per cent higher; mutton 5 per cent; beef, 15 per cent; milch cows, 7 per cent; and two-year-old stock, 20 per cent. Now, in quoting percentages I would ask the House to notice that the percentage by no means conveys the effect on the profits of farming. The cost of production varies but little, and any change in prices falls mainly on the margin of profit. To explain clearly what I mean I will give an example. Suppose that the value of a particular article is £10, and the cost of producing that article is £5; if, by some means or other, a reduction in value of £2 10s. is brought about, the reduction on the margin of profit would not be 25 per cent, but 50 per cent. Now, Sir, I would ask what qualification a rent fixed for a period of years ought to possess? There can be no doubt that it ought not to be a rent which could be paid in a bad year. In that case it might be unfairly low for an average year, and decidedly too low for a good year. But, for the same reason, it ought not to be a rent which could only be paid in a good year; it ought to be a rent which the tenants could pay in an average year, and then, in an extra good year, they would be able to realize sufficient to carry them over a bad year. That is the only principle on which a fair rent could be fixed.

Mr. Mahony

We have been asked whether the Commissioners took into consideration the recommendations of the Bessborough Commission. My answer to that is this. The Bessborough Commission sat, I think, before the period of depression had ended; and the improvement of prices which has taken place since certainly made us look on matters in a different light. Now, Sir, we were, in fixing the rents, to ignore entirely the high prices which existed previously to the year 1879? I do not know on what basis we could do so. I do not know what the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer may think now as regards our duty in that particular; but I feel confident that if at that time he had held a brief for the landlords, and had appeared for them in one of our Courts, he would have urged upon us most strongly that we were bound to take into consideration that period of high prices in fixing a rent that was to last for 15 years. What were the rents that were fixed? We believed them at the time to be rents that could be fairly paid in an ordinary year. We believed that we had passed through the period of depression; and judging by past events—and, as far as I can see, that was the only substantial ground upon which we had to stand—we believed that the period of depression was over, and that before it returned there would be some decidedly good years. We believed that the worst was over, and we were strengthened by the fact that the year 1882 was a very much better year than the three preceding ones. But what has happened since? Have our expectations been verified? We have had one year that might be called an average year, but we have had several years below the average. We have had none—not one single year in which the tenant could save sufficient to carry him over a bad year. This state of things has been followed by a period of depression; so great that in our wildest dreams we never contemplated it. Now, I confess that I am totally ignorant of English agriculture—about as ignorant as some hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to be of Irish agriculture, and that, I think, is saying a good deal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said yesterday—speaking of that part of England with which he is personally acquainted—that larger reductions in the rent had been necessary there in the year 1885 on account of the great fall in the price of wheat. Although I know nothing of the prices of English agriculture, I have been able to refer to the average price of wheat; and I find that, taking the price of wheat in the year 1885, and comparing it with the average price in the six previous years, there was a fall of 13 per cent. I by no means mean to say that that has not rendered a large reduction of rent necessary; but taking the price of the staple articles in that part of Ireland with which I am acquainted, and comparing the price of those articles in 1885 with the six previous years, what do I find? Not a fall of 13 per cent, as was the case in wheat in England, but a fall in butter of 20 per cent; in beef of 18 per cent; in mutton of 19 per cent; in milch cows of 18½ per cent; in two-year olds of 42 per cent; and in yearling stock of 22 per cent. This, Sir, is the fall in prices which has taken place since the judicial rents were fixed, and yet the Chief Secretary for Ireland expresses a deliberate opinion that Irish farming has not been so very much affected by the fall of prices as English farming. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach: No, no! I certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman last night to acknowledge that the rents required reduction in the South of England, because of the fall in the price of wheat, and unless my memory is very faulty, the right hon. Gentleman expressed a decided opinion that the same did not apply to Ireland.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach): Bristol, W.: I am sure the hon. Member has no desire to misrepresent what I stated. My remark was, that the fall in the price of wheat had had a great effect in the South of England, and that it had led to a reduction in rent. I did not make any further statement than that.

Mr. MAHONY: I am glad to hear that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary does not maintain the opinion that the fall in agricultural produce in Ireland has not affected the question of judicial rents. I certainly thought that he did maintain that opinion, and I am delighted to hear that he does not. I think, Sir, I have shown by the account I have given of the considerations by which we were influenced when we fixed the judicial rents, and by the statement of the fall which has taken place in the prices of agricultural produce since those rents were fixed, that if they were fair at the time we fixed them they must most decidedly and certainly be unfair now. At any rate, I give that as my opinion, whatever that opinion may be worth; and it is an opinion upon which some thousands of the judicial rents have, to a very large extent, been based. It is certainly my opinion now, that the rents which for three years I took part in fixing, are at the present moment decidedly too high. I further give it as my deliberate opinion, from the knowledge I possess of a very large part of Ireland, that a majority of the tenant farmers in Ireland at the present moment are unable to pay the judicial rents. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) has quoted a high authority to show that the tenants' improvements have not been interfered with by the decision in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath;" but he omitted to mention that portion of the judgment which laid down that a tenant could be compensated for his improvements by the enjoyment of them. That is a doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) distinctly stated formed no part of the Act of 1881. In regard to the improvements, there is one other point to which I should like to direct the attention of the House. It would strike one as an ordinary matter of fairness, if we simply wished to arrive at a just decision between landlord and tenant, that, where it had been the custom for the tenant to make all the improvements, and the custom for the landlord to make none—in such cases, at any rate, the onus of proof should be thrown on the landlord. But, Sir, in any case the unfortunate tenant has to produce legal proof that the improvement has been made by him or his predecessors in title; and that fact alone has enabled the landlords, and has compelled the Land Court, to fix rent on the tenant's improvements. And now, Sir, I would like to say a word as regards those tenants who have not had judicial rents fixed. There are more things to be considered in reference to these persons than I think has yet been brought under the notice of the House. We have heard of the question of making applications to the Court. Hon. and right hon. Members do not seem to consider that the question of expense is any great bar to the tenants of Ireland; but in poor districts, such as some parts of Galway, Mayo, and Donegal, even a shilling fee, which is an absolutely necessary expense, is a matter of great importance. Besides, it is a well-known fact, to anyone who knows anything about the working of the Irish Land Act, that a tenant has little chance of pleading his case successfully unless he has legal assistance, which cannot be obtained for 1s. I am well acquainted with a large portion of Donegal. I know one district where I do not think a single tenant farmer would have been able to enter the Court, except for the energetic and charitable and patriotic action of the parish priest. I allude to Father McFadden, of Gweedore. And the system he adopted was this. On a small sum being guaranteed to him by the tenant, he undertook to bring the case before the Court, and to return to the tenant whatever amount he received from him in the event of failure to obtain a reduction. What was the result of the action of this gentleman? Why, on one estate which up to that time had been looked on as a model estate amongst the landlords the tenants got a reduction—I am speaking now from memory—of, I think, 37 per cent. That created a tremendous flutter amongst the landlords; the Chief Commissioners were immediately besieged on the subject, and they, most improperly, I think, did a thing which they did in no other case—namely, resolved to hold a special sitting, to decide at once whether these frightful reductions on this model estate were justified. Owing to some disagreement this special sitting did not come off; but these cases have since been re-heard by the Chief Commissioners, and the decisions have been confirmed. There is another point besides the expense that has acted as a great bar to many tenants availing themselves of the Land Act, especially the small tenants, and that is the question of the right of turbary. On many estates it has been the custom to give the tenants the privilege of cutting turf at a merely nominal figure. Well, some landlords, to my certain knowledge, have made use of their power over the right of turbary to prevent their tenants from going into the Court. They have warned their tenants that if they went into the Court they would have to look for turbary elsewhere. Other landlords, after the tenants have been into Court, and have obtained a reduction of their rent—and to the small tenants this has been a serious injury—have recouped themselves to the full amount of the reduction by increasing the sum charged for turbary. The same system and practice has been pursued with regard to other privileges usually accorded to the tenantry, such as mountain grazing. Here is another matter that the landlords use as a lever to prevent the tenants from going into the Court, and that is the hanging gale. It is the custom in many parts of Ireland not to ask for the payment of the rent that falls due in March or May until the following September or November. Many landlords, after the judicial rent has been fixed, have departed from this custom, and have forced the tenants to pay the new rent on the day on which it fell due. By refusing the old-established privilege of the hanging gale to their tenants holding under judicial rents, and by continuing to grant it, not only to those who hold under their old rents, but also to those who settled with their landlords out of Court, they have put a premium on settlements out of Court; and they have, in many cases, forced their tenants to agree to pay higher rents by arrangement out of Court than those tenants would have had to pay if they had gone into the Land Court. This, Sir, is the way in which the landlords have facilitated the carrying out of the Act on which Her Majesty's present Government take their stand. These are the tenants which the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant says have no grievance—I mean the tenants who do not hold under judicial rents—because, as the right hon. Gentleman says, they can apply to the Court to fix judicial rents, and can also apply to the Court to put a stay on eviction proceedings. Unless I am very much mistaken, in order to do these things the tenants must apply to two Courts; because the Court to which the landlord applies for power to evict is the County Court, and the Court the tenant applies to to fix a fair rent is the Land Commission Court; and unless I am much mistaken they must apply first to the Land Commission Court to fix a fair rent, and then apply to the County Court Judge and ask him to put a stay on the proceedings for eviction. And suppose the tenants succeed before the County Court Judge, and get a stay on the proceedings, what advantage will they gain? They will be put on terms to pay a certain amount of rent, pending the settlement of a fair rent, and when that fair rent is fixed it will only take effect from the next gale day, and up to that very day they will have to pay the old rack-rent just the same as before, so that I fail to see what benefit the tenants will derive, even if a stay of proceedings is obtained. They will not be in a bit better position to pay the arrears. They will have to pay all the arrears at the same old rent. The Court has no power whatever to deal with that. Now, Sir, I should like to ask the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, how it happens that the Government have omitted to mention altogether what they intend to do as regards leaseholders? I think I am right in saying that no Member of Her Majesty's Government has given us even an inkling of what they intend to do with regard to leaseholders. Now, what is the position of leaseholders? Many of them took their leases in order to escape from the power of the landlords to raise the rent. That power became so intolerable that the Government stepped in and deprived the landlord of the power to raise the rent; and the very men who felt that power in the most bitter manner, and to whom it was so galling that in order to protect themselves they undertook to pay for a term of years a high rent, so that it might not be perpetually raised, are deprived of the benefit of the Act which the Government passed. If there is a case to be brought before the notice of the Government more weighty than another it certainly is the case of the leaseholders. Besides the ordinary case of the leaseholders, there is the case of those who have accepted leases since the Act of 1870—since the time when Parliament put a premium upon leases in Ireland. It has been proved, over and over again, that many landlords forced their tenants to take leases, and in order to meet that difficulty a clause was put in the Act of 1881 enabling the tenants who had been unjustly forced to take leases to break them. But the Chief Land Commissioner in Ireland, Judge O'Hagan, has stated that it would pass the wit of man to understand how, according to the interpretation of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, there could possibly be an unjust lease. So that that clause of the Act of 1881 has completely failed. Sir, the only hope of the amendment of the Act of 1881 which Her Majesty's Government has held out is the amendment of the Purchase Clauses. I should say by all means put the landlords in a position to come to an agreement with their tenants. Give the Courts more power to deal with head rents and head landlords like Trinity College; but see that the tenants are free to make their contracts too. The case to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) referred looked to me rather as if the landlord, under the threat of eviction, or by some such power, had managed to make his tenants agree to terms which were unfairly high. Certainly, the Commissioners must have considered the terms unfairly high, or they would not have refused to sanction them. I am aware of some cases in which the landlords and tenants have come to terms as regards purchase, and the Chief Commissioners have sanctioned those terms; and in the same county, almost in the same district, they have refused to sanction the terms on which agreements, or so-called agreements, have been made, and I think they were right in doing so, because the amount one gentleman, at any rate, sought to charge the tenants was very much higher than any other landlord in the district was able to obtain. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland does not appear to think that the terms were unfairly high, because the Land Commission refused to sanction them; and he deliberately proposes to make such an alteration in the Act that extra security shall be given for repayment of the purchase money by the Local Bodies in distressed districts. I think that, before he has been very much longer in Office, he will discover that the Local Bodies in the distressed districts of the West of Ireland are not very well suited to the giving of security. I think he will find that he has difficulty enough in getting these Local Bodies to pay the rates, which will, undoubtedly, be very high, in consequence of the manner in which the distress in these districts has been dealt with. And now, Sir, Members of the Party to which I have the honour to belong have been accused of being ready to agree to the provision of 20 years' purchase in the Act introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian last Session. As well as I remember, I do not think that any Member of that Party expressed approval of the 20 years; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has told us that the 20 years was no principle of the Bill. It was clearly an accidental provision, and the right place to discuss that provision would have been when the Bill got into Committee. If the Government are determined to take their stand on the Act of 1881, I would appeal to them to take their stand on the spirit of that Act, and not on the letter. We know that they are inclined to prefer the letter to the spirit. We know that they are inclined to grasp at the shadow and lose the substance; we know that they sit on those Benches because they prefer a dead and soulless piece of paper to a real and living union of hearts. They say they have the mandate of the constituencies for that; but I do not think they can claim any mandate for maintaining the letter of the Act of 1881 in such a manner as to kill the spirit. If they cannot make their Government agreeable to us, at any rate they can make it bearable as a temporary and necessary evil. But if, instead, they adhere to the policy which has been explained by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer—if they adhere to this policy of exciting the landlords to exact to the uttermost their legal rights, then, indeed, we have reason to be alarmed. We have been told there is no need to fear the state of things in November, because ejectments cannot be obtained until January. I should like to ask what right hon. Gentlemen opposite have to say about the September and November rents payable in March and May, and the March and May rents payable in September and November, for which ejectments have already been obtained? How are we to escape from them? Are the landlords to be trusted to exercise their rights with moderation? I was lately in a distressed district in the West of Ireland—in one of those special districts where the population were undoubtedly in danger of starvation unless proper means had been taken to give them assistance—and in that very district I saw enough to assure me how little the landlords are to be trusted. In the village of Muckenagh the inhabitants were turned out wholesale. A large force of Constabulary was present at the evictions, and a gentleman who saw every house in that village emptied of everything it contained did not see one single potato taken out and only a few handfuls of meal from some of them. The Constabulary were so affected by the whole scene that they emptied their knapsacks and gave the starving people all they had to eat. That is an example of the moderation practised by some landlords. The hon. Gentleman the Member for one of the Divisions of Queen's County has alluded to the ejectments that have taken place in the Gweedore district—a district quite as poor, I believe, as any of the distressed districts in Galway; and if landlords have acted in the past few months in that manner, what may we not expect from them under the direct encouragement given to them by the Government to exercise their legal rights to the utmost? But, Sir, if the Government think that they are going quietly to get rid of the people of Ireland I think they mistake the present attitude of the Irish people. They do not appreciate how much of the peaceful attitude of the Irish is due to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in the name of the English people, extended to us the right hand of friendship. They do not appreciate the fact that we now have friends in this country, and that they are a strong, numerous, and united Party—united to one another and to us, not merely by a common opposition to one particular Bill, or, perhaps, it might be more accurately described, as a common opposition to one particular man, but by the broad platform of similar ideas and similar projects. What we want to do for the Irish Democracy according to Irish ideas, the Party with which we are joined in England want to do for the English Democracy according to English ideas; and they will not only join us in denouncing crime, but they will also join us in denouncing those outrages that are committed under the protection and in the name of the law.

MR. AMBROSE Middlesex, Harrow : I do not wish to speak at great length on this Amendment; but I desire to congratulate the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on the character in which he is appearing in connection with this proposal—figuring as he does before the taxpayers of England as their champion, because the latter part of the Amendment, I observe, deals not with the interests of the people of Ireland, not with the interests of the poor suffering people who, as indicated, are about to go through such a dreadful winter, but with the interests of the taxpayers of England. He says—

"That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are."

Well, I hope the hon. Gentleman will succeed in obtaining some little popularity from the taxpayers of England, because of the care and attention he is paying to their interests; but I trust the population of Ireland will observe that the hon. Member is prepared, from that point of view, to sacrifice their interests in the coming winter, because, so far, the only proposition which is before the House—or I should rather say not before the House, but which has been foreshadowed in the speech of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer Lord Randolph Churchill—was the suggestion that there should be a Royal Commission appointed for the purpose of inquiring whether or not judicial rents in Ireland are too high, and of considering what should be done in the matter. In truth, there was nothing before the House that could justify this condemnation on which comes in his speech by anticipation. I cannot help thinking that we should look between the lines of this Amendment in order to ascertain the hon. Member's real purpose. You do not find it clearly expressed. Clearly it is not the point here mentioned, because there is no measure before the House proposing to tax the English taxpayers; and if there were, it is obvious it could not come on before next spring, whereas the difficulties pointed out in the Amendment are difficulties which would be experienced by the Irish tenants during the coming winter. Therefore, it is quite clear that that is not the object. It seems to me that the real object of this Amendment is to put on record a sort of grievance on behalf of the Irish tenants, and to foreshadow that which I have no doubt is in the power of the hon. Member and his followers to accomplish—namely, that if Her Majesty's Government do feel it their duty to enforce the law in protecting the officers of the law in carrying out necessary evictions there shall be social disorder, and those outrages which we are told will follow evictions. That seems to me to be the real indication contained in the hon. Member's speech. It would not have done for the hon. Member to have embodied in his Amendment a direct recommendation that evictions were to be suspended. First of all, there would be the answer that Her Majesty's Government would not feel it in their power to accept such a recommendation. Then it is quite clear that a Bill for that purpose could not be carried. But what does appear to be intended is to point out that as the consequence of evictions there will be outrages, hence we have the words—

Not only the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork, but the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland Mr. John Morley, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby Sir William Harcourt, also seemed to think that it was important to point out to the House that outrages and evictions were in some way or other connected. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland gave us figures which I, for one, am not prepared to contest. Each of those three right hon. Gentlemen ~~seem~~ to think it was incumbent on ~~us~~ to point out that in proportion as the ~~were~~ evictions, so, also, there ~~were~~ ^{might} be outrages. I am not going to accuracy of the assumption; but what does that prove? No doubt evictions have been followed by outrages; but why? Because the outrages were intended to deter landlords from proceeding to eviction; and those who are opposed to evictions are determined to see that there shall be no evictions which shall not be followed by outrages. No doubt, in the warfare here indicated, evictions, as well as outrages, are the result of the conspiracy of the National League, or whatever it may be called, to resist the payment of rent; but if you have a conspiracy of the kind, what happens? If you have a conspiracy to resist the payment of rent the landlords are bound to appeal to the law, and those who administer the law are bound to carry out evictions by way of putting down the conspiracy. If we are to give up evictions merely because they are to be followed by outrages, it would be nothing else than a complete surrender to the National League. But I venture to think that Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to make any such surrender. I know that in this House the late Chief Secretary for Ireland announced such a policy as seems to be desired by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—namely, that evictions should be suspended. I was appalled to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that he was not prepared to use the forces of the Crown to enforce what he spoke of as the shadowy rights of the landlords. Sir, I submit that Her Majesty's Government have no choice in this matter, and the right hon. Gentleman himself seemed to modify his words when he found that the Government of which he was a Member thought he had gone a little too far. No Government has a right to refuse the assistance of the law to those who have the right to claim it; and I repeat that it would be a complete surrender if we were to give up these rights merely because evictions are to be followed by outrages. It is spoken of as if it was some very great hardship that there should be evictions for non-payment of rents. For my part, I fail altogether to see any hardship in it. We must bear in mind what is the position and nature of the present tenure of land in Ireland, as well as the present rights of the landlords. First, we have the fact that a large number of landlords in Ireland were purchasers under the authority of the Encumbered Estates Court; that many landlords paid a high price for land under a Parliamentary title, in the belief that such title was to be regarded as indefeasible. What happened? Under the Act of 1881 we have the rights of landlords considerably curtailed by the establishment of tenant right. Under that Act the Irish tenants who had no right in the land, except that given by yearly tenancy, acquired what is called tenant right. Whence have they acquired that right? It was at the expense of the landlords. Before that the landlord was the owner of the estate, and he was afterwards deprived of his right to the extent of the right of which the tenant is now possessed. The landlord, when that arrangement was made—which, by the way, was forced upon him by the Act—at all events received some consideration, because the tenant became part owner of the property, conditionally, upon the payment of rent; the tenant became a sort of copyholder of the land, just as in the case of a tenant in England who is subject to ground rent—that was the way he was spoken of, I think, by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. But one of the chief points in the contract made at the time was that, at all events, the rents should have some degree of permanency. So that the landlord, taking his chance of good and bad years, should have, at least, a settled and fixed income in consideration of the abatement from his rights which went to the tenant. I am not prepared to admit that there has been a fall in the price of produce—I take the statement that is made, however; and I ask, even if there has been a considerable fall, is it fair that under the circumstances the rights of the landlord should be further curtailed? I say it is not. And I ask whether, if there had been an advance in the price of produce, the tenant would pay a higher rent? I apprehend he would do nothing of the kind, and therefore the proposal is unfair to the landlords, because it is an attempt to deprive him of what is given him by the Act of 1881. It has been said that if the land does not produce the rent it cannot be paid by the tenant; but the very terms of the Act of 1881 were that the Commissioners, in fixing the rent, should take one year with another. That was one of the duties imposed on the Commissioners, and is it to be supposed that each tenant is, year by year, to be dependent upon the annual produce of his holding for the payment of his rent? It may be so in some cases; but there must be some tenants who have very considerable savings in the banks, and anyone who will refer to a statement of the late Prime Minister will see that it is so. Why, then, if they have been able to make a profit in successful years, should they not draw upon the savings' banks to pay the landlord his rent? I know of several instances, and I have been told of others by hon. Friends to night, of men who, having refused to pay their rent on the plea of poverty, allowed the eviction to proceed and the Sheriff to take possession, but as soon as they saw that the landlord was in earnest put their hands in their pockets and paid the rents with the money that was kept there until necessity should arise. If, then, it be true in some cases, it is not true in all, that the tenants cannot pay. Supposing, then, that a tenant cannot pay his rent. I know of no law and no principle of morality or justice which can entitle a man to continue to retain possession of a piece of land held in consideration of the payment of rent, and which allows him neither to pay the rent nor give up the land. It seems to me that a man who cannot pay his rent has one duty to discharge, and that is to give up the land. It may be that if he cannot make the land pay someone else could. We cannot judge of the amount of rent to be paid by the result of the farming of an idle and incapable tenant; it is the result of the exertions of a good farmer which is the measure of the rent which should be paid. If I should hire a piano or furniture for a house on certain terms of payment, you would not say that I was entitled to keep possession of them if I could not keep up the payments; and therefore I say let the tenant give up the land, the rent of which he cannot pay, and the landlord would then have a chance of getting a tenant who could pay. The truth is that we have got into difficulty by interfering with the economic laws which regulate these matters. Parliament, in passing the Act of 1881, was led astray in the attempt to settle by law that which ought to have been left to be settled between the landlords and the tenants themselves. We have found by experience the truth of the statement of Earl Grey, who said that the economic laws had never been broken by any nation with impunity; and yet we are now asked to do what I hope the House will refuse to do—namely, further to infringe those laws.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 — Sir Thomas Esmonde.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) Paddington, S.W.: Sir, the Government would not think of offering any opposition to the adjournment of the debate to-night; but I may take the opportunity to remind the House that this is the fourth night on which we have been engaged on the Address. It is clear to many hon. Members that this debate should not be unduly protracted; and I, therefore, venture to express the hope that it may be concluded on Thursday next.

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S., and Belfast, W.): My recollection is that, in recent years, the debate on the Address has occupied 12 or 14 days, and that at times when there was much less ground of debate, and less pressing necessity in the interests of Ireland than there are on the present occasion. I do not understand that the debate upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has been at all fully developed, inasmuch as there are other facts to be urged in support of that Amendment which will be well worthy of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. I would also remind the noble Lord that there stands on the Notice Paper other Amendments to the Motion. I have given Notice of one with reference to the disturbances in Belfast, in moving which I shall have to call attention to the connection between those disturbances and the action of the noble Lord himself.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

DISTURBANCES AT BELFAST INQUIRY BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES; (Dublin University): Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the evening it was suggested that it might be desirable, for the convenience of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that I should, in moving for leave to introduce the Bill of which I have given Notice, state its principal provisions. I am glad to say I can do so in a very words indeed. The House is aware that before it left Office the late Government issued a Commission, composed of Gentlemen whose names are known, to inquire as to the origin and the circumstances of the riots and disturbances that occurred at Belfast. Now, after the Commission had been issued, it was considered, in very many quarters, that its proceedings could hardly be of a satisfactory character unless it had the power conferred upon it of summoning witnesses and examining those witnesses on oath. That is a power which can only be conferred by the Legislature, and when the present Government came into Office the matter was taken by them into consideration. Having regard to the excitement which the riots and disturbances have caused in Belfast and its neighbourhood, and having regard to the serious issues that may be inquired into by the Commission, it is considered by the Government reasonable that these powers should be given by the Legislature. There is a precedent for the granting of these powers, and the Government have determined to follow it. The Bill which I ask leave to introduce is very short and simple; it empowers the Court to summon witnesses, to enforce the production of documents, and to examine the witnesses that are produced before it on oath. It, in fact, in one clause, which is the substantive portion of the Bill, confers on the Commission the powers which belong to the High Court of Justice, or to the Judges of that country, to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to examine them. Further, of course, it empowers the Commission to imprison for contempt, that being the sanction by virtue of which Judges can enforce the attendance of witnesses. As, however, the Commission will not possess the dignity of the High Court of Justice, we propose that the powers to imprison for contempt should be limited to the period of three months—that is in accordance with precedent. If false evidence is given, the person tendering it will, of course, be subject to penalty. These are the provisions of the Bill. In introducing this Bill we have no idea of entering upon really contentious legislation. It is said it is the desire of all Parties interested that these powers should be conferred on the Commission. We heard from the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. John Morley) last night, in a speech on another subject, that he strongly approved of the measure as he understood it; and we understand it is the desire of hon. Members sitting in every quarter of the House that these powers should be given. We therefore propose a Bill for that purpose. I hope there will be no objection to it, but that it will be received in the spirit in which it is introduced.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill for facilitating the proceedings of the Commissioners appointed to hold a Court of Inquiry respecting Riots and Disturbances at Belfast.”
—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S., and Belfast, W.): I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that hon. Members from Ireland sitting in this part of the House have no thought of encountering this Bill in any factious spirit. We feel the necessity for prompt and searching inquiry into the lamentable occurrences in Belfast, and our honest desire is that the investigation shall be conducted under conditions as shall elicit the truth. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman has no objection to let us know whether the witnesses appearing before the Commission will be subject to examination and cross-examination by counsel representing the various parties interested?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES): Yes, Sir; certainly.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Before leave is given to introduce the Bill, I should like to point out that one provision, which would render the Bill a useful one, has been very singularly omitted, and that the Members of the Party to which I belong have no great confidence in the Commissioners who will be appointed to conduct the inquiry. One is a gentleman from Scotland, of whose character we know nothing whatever. We find that though the Commissioners will be entitled to issue subpœnas, there is no power to be given to any householder in Belfast to compel the issue of a subpoena to any person he may deem a material witness. It will, therefore, be in the power of the Commissioners to obtain the attendance of witnesses of such character and political colour as will please them, and we look forward with some degree of certainty to the course which will be adopted.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, and Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 35.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed, to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that the reports of the Committee do set forth the number of signatures to each Petition only in respect to those signatures to which addresses are affixed:—And that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions, as shall appear to require it:—And that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of, — Sir CHARLES FORSTER, Mr. WILLIAM LOWMYER, Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, Mr. HUGH ELLIOT, Colonel BRIDGEMAN, Mr. DONALD CRAWFORD, Mr. MELMULLAND, Viscount LAMINGTON, Mr. WIGGIN, Mr. RICHARD POWELL, Mr. McLAGAN, Mr. MORGAN HOWARD, Mr. HENRY TOLLEMACHE, Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR, and Mr. JAMES A. CAMPBELL.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Sir Charles Forster.)

OPEN SPACES AND RECREATION GROUNDS (DUBLIN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Murphy, Bill to provide for Open Spaces and Public Recreation Grounds in the City of Dublin, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Murphy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Dwyer Gray, and Mr. Timothy Harrington.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 36.]

RAILWAY REGULATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing, Bill to make further provision for the safe working of Railways, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. A. Acland, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Fenwick, Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Charles Parker, Mr. Jacoby, and Mr. Lawson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 37.]

BALLOT ACT (1872) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Waring, Bill to amend "The Ballot Act, 1872," ordered to be brought in by Colonel Waring, Mr. Francis Powell, Mr. Stanley Loughton, Colonel Sanderson, and Mr. Baden-Powell.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 38.]

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Several Members took and subscribed the Oath.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [FIFTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [19th August.]—[See page 96.]

And which Amendment was,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words,—“And humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fear that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing widespread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

RENT.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) said that, notwithstanding all that had been said on the opposite

Benches during the course of the debate, he ventured to assert that the condition of the tenantry of Ireland was one which demanded immediate attention and immediate action on the part of Her Majesty's Government, whatever Her Majesty's Ministers might say to the contrary. The Irish Members were in a position to speak with somewhat of authority on that subject, and they deemed it their duty to lay before the country the extreme urgency of the question. Owing to the great depression or fall in the prices of agricultural produce, rents which were fixed two years ago, and which then might have been considered fair rents, could not now, in many cases, be possibly paid. It was a matter of public notoriety, notwithstanding the assertions made yesterday by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket), that those rents were fixed on the supposition that the price of agricultural produce had reached the lowest point; but since that time there had been a still further fall in agricultural produce, and the result was that those judicial rents, which might have been fair when they were fixed, were now certainly rack-rents, and impracticable. Her Majesty's Government had informed the country that they intended to uphold social order in Ireland; but if by the maintenance of social order they meant the maintenance of the assistance of the landlords in exacting rents from the tenants, which the land had not produced, the outlook for the peace of the country during the coming winter was dark in the extreme. Not only had agricultural produce fallen in value, but in many cases it was wholly unsaleable. In the county of Wexford, which was supposed to be one of the most prosperous districts in Ireland, he could state, as a fact, that the farmers had often brought their stock, or their grain, or their butter, to market, and had been unable to dispose of it at any price. If that was the state of things in the county Wexford, what must be the case in the Southern and Western districts of the country? And yet it was in the Southern and Western districts that the landlords were dealing most harshly towards their tenants, and were committing acts, such as those committed at Gweedore, which, if committed in any English county, would rouse a storm of indignation throughout the land. The result of these acts was to drive the people to seek shelter in the ditches, or in the workhouse—that demoralizing institution—or to drive them into the slums of great English cities, to swell the numbers of our already over-crowded labour market, or to drive them to America, where they joined the large body of inveterate and determined foes which injustice had raised against England. Were these results such as would commend themselves to the people of England, or to a Government which pretended to be actuated by the loftiest Constitutional principles? Her Majesty's Government were not justified in the reckless waste of public money which these evictions caused. Moreover, the economic and social results proceeding from them were sad in the extreme. They were therefore entitled to ask Her Majesty's Government what steps they intended to take to deal with the agrarian situation in Ireland? In many parts of the South and West the rents were not made out of the land, but were paid either from the wages of Irish harvestmen in England, or else by the illicit distillation of whisky. He did not think English artisans and labourers would uphold a system which tended to flood the English labour market with Irish labour. If evictions were permitted during the coming winter crime would result; and, although they might deplore the crimes, they could not absolve the Executive Government from the responsibility of allowing a state of things to exist from which such disorders arose. They had been told that they were preaching the "No Rent" doctrine, but they were doing nothing of the sort. They did not, by any means, deny to the Irish landlords their just share in what the soil had produced. So long as dual ownership in land prevailed, so long were the landlords entitled to their share in the produce, but only their fair share. The landlord had an indefeasible right to the rent, but only to a just rent. He had no moral right, whatever his legal right might be, to claim from his tenant a larger rent than the land produced. The landlord and tenant were joint owners in a common property—in a common concern—and if the working of that concern resulted in a profit, the landlord was entitled to a share in the profit; but if the profits diminished, the landlord could only claim a diminished share of the profit. If the working of the land produced a loss, then the landlord must bear his share of that loss. The proposal of the Government to appoint a Commission was not satisfactory, because the mischief would be done before any remedy would be applied. At any rate, the Irish Members had made their position clear in this matter. The question at issue was a pressing one for immediate action, and required a pressing and immediate remedy. If the landlords insisted upon rents which the land had not produced outrages would undoubtedly follow, and after the warning which the Government had received the blame could not be laid at the doors of the Irish Members. ["Hear, hear!"] If the Government intended coercion it would be more manly for them to declare their intention openly. Since the Irish Parliament was destroyed they had 86 Coercion Acts; and, speaking as an Irishman, he would say that no number of Coercion Acts would cause the Irish people to renounce or lose faith in their right to make their own laws. Indeed, the large number of Coercion Acts there had already only intensified the national feeling. If they did not insist on a policy of coercion, and desired to govern Ireland in a Constitutional manner, they would be wise to take the advice of the Irish Members, and stop indiscriminate evictions in Ireland, because of the non-payment of rents which the land would not produce. This advice was tendered the Government; and if they did not accept it, they must rank with those of whom Fielding has it—"That they are unable to gather wit or wisdom from anyone capable of lending them either." The Irish Representatives had done their duty to the country and to themselves, and if the Government chose to turn a deaf ear to their warnings, they washed their hands of the responsibility.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND, Fermagh, N., said, it was the duty of each Representative of the Irish people, one after another, to endorse emphatically the statements contained in the speech of the Leader of the Party to which he had the honour to belong. The hon. Member for Cork, Mr. Parnell, has struck the keynote of the situation when he stated that during the coming winter the people in many parts of Ireland would find themselves unable to pay their rents, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said they must pay, or allow the landlords to recover their property. In the coming winter it would be impossible for many of the tenants to pay their rents. There was no use in dealing with the question in a roundabout way. There was no use in discussing the question what would be the final settlement of the Land Question. They must address themselves to the immediate point. The one question upon which they should keep their attention was that if the landlords accepted the invitation of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill), and that unless the landlords, either by law or by the private influence of the Government, or the influence of some people who had influence with them, were prevented from exacting, or attempting to exact, the rents that had been fixed by the Land Commissioners under the Land Act, the people would be evicted by thousands during the coming winter. What they had got to decide on at this moment, he thought, was whether the landlords were to be allowed to evict the people for rents which they could not pay. Were the people of England prepared to see Irish tenants, with their wives and families, cast upon the roadside? If there was a conspiracy against the payment of rents the case would be altered altogether; but there was no conspiracy against the payment of judicial rent, nor was there a single Member who sat near him who had encouraged the tenants to such a policy. Even when the "No Rent" Manifesto was issued the people, to a large extent, refused to avail themselves of it. The only conspiracy was on the part of the landlords, who would not accept such rent as the people were willing and able to pay. The difficulty would be reached next November. There was no use in appointing Commissions of Inquiry. The Land Question had already been sifted to the bottom. It had been inquired into and reported upon incessantly for the last 50 years. The Commission would not make its Report till next spring, whereas the tenants must pay in November or be evicted from their holdings. The Commission was a mockery to the Irish people, and would only serve to inflame their passions and increase their belief that the noble Lord and his Government did not really want to save the people from their landlords, but desired the landlords to go ahead in their evictions, and thereby cause outrage in order to furnish the Government with a pretext for introducing a Coercion Bill next year. The proposal of the Government was idiotic, and could only have proceeded from a stripling statesman, who was but a sorry substitute for the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. The noble Lord had told the landlords in effect that the Government would offer no obstacle to wholesale eviction; and there was nothing in the history of the landlords which encouraged a hope that they would not exact their pound of flesh, as they had done in the past, and especially at the time of the famine. This was not a matter which would brook delay. Immediate action was necessary, as the dark shadow was already athwart the country. In fact, the evil had already begun. In an evening paper yesterday there was an account of the arrival at the New Ross Workhouse of 62 persons, the wives and families of 13 evicted tenants on the Marquess of Ely's estate in Wexford. Then it was suggested that the tenants should pay their full rents out of the savings of former years. A more unjust or merciless proposal he never heard. The truth was that these supposed savings of the Irish farmers were, for the most part, entirely mythical. The county of Wexford was one of the most prosperous in Ireland, and was absolutely free from outrage. But even there the farmers were not able to pay their rents, though in numberless cases they had in the past paid them out of the remittances sent by their kindred in America and Australia. The last Christmas Return from the United States showed that no less than 8,000,000 dollars had been sent to Ireland in this way, every penny of which had gone to the landlords. There were no means of raising money to which the wretched tenants would not resort rather than face the bitter necessity of leaving their homesteads. The hon. Member for Cork had made the most practical suggestion—namely, that the rents should be revised every three years instead of every 15, in accordance with the variation in prices. If that suggestion were not adopted, and if the landlords refused to accept what the people could pay, there would be such an outbreak in Ireland as had not been known for many a long year. The people had been extraordinarily quiet under great provocation; but unless the Government did something they would become desperate. If evictions should be made wholesale and the people driven to fight in defence of their homesteads, there could be no mistake as to who were the originators of so great a calamity, and the people of England would not fail to lay the blame on the heads of a Government which, in so great a crisis, had nothing better to offer than the appointment of a Commission whose Report would be too late to deal with the evil of which it purported to be a remedy. The Irish Representatives had done their duty by giving the Government timely warning; and when the hands of the Government were stained with the blood of the Irish people, they could call the world to witness that they were innocent.

Mr. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) said, he thought the moderate tone of the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was better suited to the occasion than the inflammatory rhetoric to which the House had just listened. In the speech of the hon. Member for Cork there seemed to be more feeling and more reality than in the speech delivered by a distinguished statesman above the Gangway on the same side of the House—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt)—in whose every sentence was discernible the actor who was willing to take any part in the play in order to make certain of his filling a position on the stage. The hon. Member for Cork had raised a real issue by the Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper. The Irish problem consisted of two factors—the agrarian and the political—and the hon. Member and his Friends had, with great ingenuity and persistence, striven to connect the two inseparably. The connection of these two factors was a question of life and death to hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. It was to them a question of life and death that the agrarian difficulty should not be solved until the political difficulty should have been settled to their taste. It was, therefore, not a matter for surprise that speech after speech should be delivered by hon. Members opposite with the same object as that of the addresses which for months past had been heard on the hill-sides of Ireland. It was not surprising, he maintained, that inflammatory speeches should be made, having for their purpose the prevention, at all hazards, of the solution of the agrarian difficulty. The Party to which he belonged took a different view; they did not hold that the agrarian difficulty could not be dealt with separately from the political difficulty. The hon. Member for Cork, in his argument in support of the contrary view, had said that the Irish people would not surrender their birthright — namely, national independence—for the mess of pottage which the Government offered to them; but this mess of pottage to which the hon. Member referred meant nothing less than the prosperity and happiness of his country. There were two distinct aspects to the agrarian problem in Ireland. The aspect of the difficulty in the extreme West was different from that prevailing in the other Provinces. In the West the difficulty was perpetual in its character, the reason being the congestion of the population. The people there could not, and never had, paid their rents out of their earnings derived from agriculture. Their rents had been paid, to a large extent, out of the wages earned by the peasants who came to this country in the autumn to assist in the harvest work. Although the seaboard of the Western counties afforded opportunities for the successful pursuit of the fishing industry, the people had but little knowledge of the occupation, and could not practise it in such a way as to make it even moderately remunerative. When all the conditions of the problem were considered, it was impossible to believe that it could be solved, except by reducing the congestion of the district by the removal of many of the inhabitants. In the rest of Ireland the present condition of agriculture was, no doubt, such as rendered the payment of rents exceedingly difficult in certain cases. Much the same state of things existed in England, with this remarkable exception—that greater advantages were derived from the peculiar agriculture of Ireland than from the agriculture of England. The grazing products of Ireland had had a very much better market than the agricultural produce of our arable land in England. But, granting that the Irish farmers sometimes found it difficult to meet the demands of their landlords, the disease was a natural one to which a natural remedy ought to be applied. The rent ought to rise and fall with the rise and fall of the price of produce; but that natural remedy had been displaced by the inversion of the laws of political economy, for which the country had to thank right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. It seemed to him now, as in 1881, when it was proposed to introduce sumptuary laws on a gigantic scale, that a difficulty was imported into the problem which was absolutely certain to become a Nemesis. They were now shaking hands with Nemesis, and it was because they were doing so that they felt considerably stirred when they found the attitude of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to be that of cynics on this occasion. The difficulty was that the English Government had approached a very small part of the community, who were constituted the life-tenants of the land in Ireland, and said to them that, in view of the dangers of their position, they insisted by legislation that those life-tenants should be fined to the extent of 25 per cent of their incomes. The Government did not distribute the fine among all the partners who had an interest in the property—upon legatees and mortgagees—but imposed the whole burden on the tenant for life, and said—"We call upon you to make this sacrifice for the sake of peace and of the prosperity of the country; and, at the same time, we hold out to you this boon—that, having fixed the rent judicially and by the authority of Parliament, you may depend upon receiving it regularly for many years to come." When that offer had been made and embodied in an Act of Parliament, it seemed to him an exceedingly difficult thing for Parliament to restrain its hand when these same men came before it and said that the rents which were guaranteed by statutory title were no longer paid—not very often or very largely because they could not be paid, but because those who ought to pay them were being incited not to pay them; and because if they paid them they would be postponing that time which was longed for by hon. Gentlemen opposite when the Irish tenants

should obtain what they called their independence. That was the motive which was being put before the peasants and farmers in all directions. Under these very awkward conditions he held that hon. Gentlemen opposite, no less than those on his own side of the House, were bound in equity to take care that the landlords should not suffer; and, therefore, he approved the proposal that a diligent inquiry should be made to ascertain in what cases there was a reasonable and in what cases an unreasonable opposition to the payment of rent. In any case, if Parliament, avowedly for the peace or benefit of the community, imposed a fresh fine by way of a compulsory reduction in rent on an individual or a class, he felt bound to say that that fine should be distributed among them all; and he would remind the hon. Member for Northampton, whose speech he otherwise largely approved, that he misunderstood the chivalrous instincts of the artisans whom he (Mr. Howorth) claimed to know very intimately in Lancashire, if he supposed that they were not willing to share such burdens when equitably laid for a national purpose. Under any circumstances, there would be a permanent difficulty to meet in Ireland—namely, that barriers could only be temporarily raised against the laws of political economy, and that when those barriers were removed there would be precisely the same difficulties to meet which had to be met in 1881. There would still be a large number of men competing for farms, and so long as those men elected to remain on land upon which they could not live prosperously and well, so long would there be a permanent agrarian difficulty in Ireland. In his opinion, the only permanent remedy for this state of things was the remedy to be found in emigration. There was, perhaps, another alternative, and one which commended itself to hon. Members opposite. It was, no doubt, quite possible, as had been urged by the hon. Member for Cork, to keep these people at home by protecting the national products of Ireland against everybody, even against England. But he doubted if such a remedy would be satisfactory to the bulk of hon. Members opposite, and it seemed to him at least to be a very remote remedy. In conclusion, he begged to thank hon. Members for the patience with which they had listened to him when addressing the House for the first time.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, that although the House had been called together to vote Supplies, the discussion of grievances and remedial measures usually accompanied the voting of Supplies; but the Government, though they had nothing to propose themselves, seemed determined that private Members should not propose any remedial measures, and so deprived them of the Constitutional right of stating their grievances before Supply was granted. In fact, the Government had undertaken quite a new rôle, and had constituted themselves a universal blockading Party. In his opinion, the Cabinet should either be prepared to bring in remedial measures themselves for the relief of Irish wrongs, or, at least, show that their intentions were virtuous by not obstructing private Members who desired to make an attempt at accomplishing that in which the Government had failed. The suggestion that the Irish difficulty could only be met by further depopulation seemed to him to be deserving of the severest reprobation of the House. He would point out, not that it was necessary, because every impartial person admitted the existence of Irish wrongs, that in effect the state of things in the Sister Country was that within the last 30 years the population had diminished by nearly 2,000,000 of people, whilst, at the same time, the relative pauperism of the country had more than doubled. This was the country which was accused of shamming their inability to pay rent by keeping back their savings. It therefore seemed to him that the removal of the population by emigration, instead of increasing the prosperity of Ireland, had diminished it. He, with other political economists, did not believe that the prosperity or wealth of a country was increased by depopulation. The proposals of the Government—if, indeed, they could be dignified by the name of proposals—were that certain Commissions should be issued to report on the condition of things in Ireland. Of course, the Government were best acquainted with the condition of their own minds, and how far they themselves were possessed of information with regard to Ireland. Royal Commissions necessarily caused delay, and he was, on principle, opposed to them. In this particular case the Reports of the Commissions would in all probability be brought into the House long after the events with which they dealt had passed away. He was unwilling to impute the criminal motive of delay to the Government in the proposed scheme of multifarious Commissions of Inquiry. Yet he had to say that the hinted-at procedure certainly would generally be thought to be of such a character. The Tories, as a Party, were strong on the question of political economy; they constantly obtruded their acquaintance with philosophic economics. But it struck him that the economical character which they wished to be credited with existed chiefly in phrase, and not in concrete. He had found on looking back that Toryism had repudiated, or, at least, had not acted on, the principle of orthodox economics, from Adam Smith down to contemporary economists. Rather had they taken advantage of what was false and exploited in Mill, and of what was Socialistic in writers like Jevons and Cairnes when the borrowed matter was favourable to their privileges. Tories should not talk of scientific economics. The matter before the House was not one of economic facts, nor of economic mechanics. He regarded a man as anything but a machine. They wanted to improve the state of things which existed, and had long continued to exist, in Ireland, and which menaced the peace of the country and harassed themselves. The Government had forgotten that some measures, at least, of relief should have been suggested. He believed that the Government had made a mistake when it did not fall in with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), who had recommended not only the justice, but the expediency of at least some preventive measures to sterilize the crop of crime which would surely be born of unjust and heartless eviction. He knew little about evictions himself, and he was sure the English people knew as little as he. He, however, had seen localities where eviction had occurred, and he was satisfied from the horrible impressions which had been made on him that the English people—the working men—if they were better informed would not tolerate the existence of such a system. Facts and figures were the only arguments—slow, but sure, however—by which the eviction system could be exposed. From 1817 until 1851 he found that the number of families evicted in Ireland were 263,000. Those readmitted as caretakers amounted to 73,000, so that there were about 190,000 families evicted during four years. Mr. Mulhall, the statistician, had calculated that during a period of 33 years there had been evicted 2,412,000 persons—that was to say, over 70,000 persons per annum. This was appalling; it was dreadful—it was a horrible state of things for the people of this country to contemplate. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) that the hard-working men of this country would be prepared to pay something out of their own pockets, if the money went for the relief of the people in the distressed districts; but what they objected to was that the money paid by the taxpayers should go where it had gone before—namely, into the pockets of the landlords. It could hardly be believed, but it was a fact, that during the last seven years he found that the number of civil bill ejectments served in Ireland amounted to 116,818. Some of the ejected, doubtless, had been replaced as caretakers; but what a condition of dependent misery was that. Whilst he did not wish to harass the Government in carrying on the rule of Ireland, he wished to state that he believed his support was due to the Irish Party when he saw the duties of Office shirked, or, at best, foolishly performed by them. He should urge on the Government the absolute necessity of taking steps to ease the coming winter for the Irish tenants if they would do nothing more, so that evictions, and with evictions crime, should be stopped in that long-oppressed and unfortunate country.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) said, that the two last speakers had claimed to speak on behalf of working men. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) had stated that the working men were prepared to bear a national fine in favour of the landlords in Ireland, and the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Howell) had said that the working men would be content to bear a national fine on behalf of the Irish tenants. He himself claimed to represent a working class constituency, and the working men of that constituency; and he wished to say that his constituents objected to pay one shilling of English taxation for the relief either of the landlords or the tenants of Ireland. With the working men, and also with the classes in his constituency, no measure would be so unpopular as that which would saddle the taxation of this country, or any of the industries of this country, with any charge whatever for the relief of landlords in Ireland. The Land Act of 1881, although it provided for the fixing of judicial rent, said not a single word about an Imperial guarantee for judicial or other rents; and if the landlords could not get their rents—and he hoped they would—they would but be in the same position as the unhappy manufacturers in Lancashire and in the North, who, when they could not get their money, were obliged to go without or do with less, and put up with the consequences. Nothing could be more distressing than evictions; but they occurred in England as well as in Ireland. It was not pleasant to contemplate a distress for rent or an execution for debt; but still the law was enforced in England against debtors. He should like to know what was proposed to be done in Ireland hereafter when a man wished to remove others from his land? People had to be evicted by others beside landlords. When the members of a family increased in number beyond the power of the land to afford them a living, the person who was in possession must evict the others; and all the troubles and miseries of eviction must, therefore, exist under any other system of law. The people who could not live on the land must go elsewhere, and if they could not find work in Ireland they must do what hon. Members opposite very much disliked—namely, emigrate. The best way for either a landlord or a tenant to get on in this world was by practising industry, hard work, and sobriety, and, above all, by the absence of political agitation. While he regretted evictions in Ireland, he believed there was nothing which this House could do that would really ease the tenants very much. One thing he hoped never would be done, and that was to assist either landlords or tenants by the money of the hard-working British taxpayer.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. Addison

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) said, he was anxious to join his voice to that of the Irish Party in expressing his belief in the total and absolute inadequacy of the Government proposals to meet the political and social crisis in which we were environed. He must state his satisfaction at the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), because the most industrious and ingenious critic would be unable to find, however energetic his search, any amelioration for the grievance which the Amendment embodied. The policy of the Government was a policy of somnolency, mischievousness, and inadequacy. It would passively permit landlord privileges, which, if unacknowledged, would be sanctioned by coercion, whilst no guarantee for the security of the Irish tenantry was offered. This mischievous and evil policy of delay, which made the tenant, where his own interests were concerned, the centre of remedial inaction, was most suited to the atmosphere of "Sleepy Hollow" than to the age of motion in which we lived. A Cabinet of "Rip Van Winkles" had satisfied their cravings of over-exerted duty, by fancying that they could retire to sleep for six months, and find out, at their awakening, all difficulties smoothed and dangers overcome. That was an unexaggerated description, in his opinion, of the policy of the Government; but he was inclined to imagine that the probability would be that the Ministerial slumbers should be disturbed by exciting and spectral dreams. The political intentions of the Government had been well characterized as a universal examination and inquiry bureau. The scheme of Commissions he considered a device not above the inventive faculty of a nation in a state of anarchy, and of about the mental status of a primitive community. The Irish people were starving owing to inexorable economic circumstances, in addition to the effects of political mismanagement. Eviction was stalking through the land with the but too willing "crowbar brigade" in the rear; and yet the Government proposed to consider the ways and means of remedy months hence. The Commission would not bring immediate relief to the tenant farmers of Ireland, and it was exactly the need of immediate relief in which the Irish farmers stood. Besides, Royal Commissions and Committees, they believed, would effect no good. Committees of this House and Royal Commissions had been shown, by the testimony of history in regard to Irish affairs, to resemble very much barren orchards. The trees might flower; but they would never bear any fruit. The evidence obtained by Committees, and Reports which had been presented by them to the House, would be worthless and valueless so far as relief was concerned. They were the acknowledgment of the debt which the English people and the English Parliament owed to the Irish people; but beyond these acknowledgments the English Parliament never got, and the Irish tenant farmer—in spite of these Reports—never reaped any substantial benefit. The Reports of these Commissions were, in fact, as valueless as the I.O.U.'s. of Mr. Micawber. There was no necessity for appointing any Commission, because the Government had evidence amply sufficient to go upon, if they wished to do anything for the immediate benefit of the tenant farmers and the artizan classes of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the mild and generous speech he made the other night, told them that the reason the House of Commons had never given any effect to the Reports of those Committees was that they were invariably composed of Irishmen in sympathy with the Irish tenant farmers and the artizan classes, and the British Parliament naturally hesitated to spend millions of money in giving effect to those Reports. Why was the Devon Commission of 1845 comprised of men who sympathized with the Irish peasantry? The Devon Commission was composed of Irish landlords. That Commission held an inquiry extending over two years, during which time it received a large amount of valuable information. In its Report the Commission indicated the lines along which agrarian legislation should proceed; but Parliament never gave any effect to those recommendations until 1871, when the intensity of the Fenian movement compelled Parliament to direct its attention to the Irish agrarian difficulty. Did the Government, in appointing the various Commissions fore-shadowed in the Speech from the Throne, wish the same educational force to be applied again, in order to teach them that the long dreary chapter of agrarian injustice in Ireland was not yet closed? The teachings of Irish history and the record of the relations which had subsisted between the Parliament of this country and the Irish people had shown that Commissions and Committees in reference to Irish matters were shams and frauds. The records of those relations were as thickly strewn as the Atlantic was with the wrecks of noble vessels. In these circumstances, he believed that this system of inquiry by Royal Commissions would fail to bring any benefit either to the Irish people or to the tenant farmers of the country. What was needed at the present time was what was pointed out in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. Ireland called for something more immediate, more courageous, and more definite, and for a more sustaining course of policy than could be supplied by Commissions of this House, be they Royal or otherwise. They demanded intelligent attention. At the present there were two facts staring them in the face. In the first place, the land of Ireland could not at present pay the burden of rent imposed upon it; and, as a necessary sequence of that fact, evictions throughout the country were daily increasing. The Government might deny these premises—the English Government always did deny there was any exceptional distress in Ireland until the whole world recognized it, and then they were shamed into some acknowledgment of the fact that distress prevailed in Ireland. As it has been in former times, so it was to-day. This remark applied to the crisis of 1879, but more particularly to the famine of 1847. On the eve of the potato famine of 1847, the Duke of Richmond denied the statements then made as to the destitution; but the Duke of Richmond recognized no one as a man of responsibility unless he was a Duke or a Member of Her Majesty's Government. Lord George Bentinck had also said that the potato famine was a great delusion. Lord Stanley, the father of the noble Lord who speaks on behalf of England in "another place," denied its existence, and declared later that the famine in Ireland was a baseless vision. But quickly enough following these declarations all the horrors of the famine were seen, for, as a matter of fact, people were literally dying of starvation by hundreds on the roadside. It seemed to him that there was a strong family likeness between the utterances of the nobleman he had just cited and those which came from the mouthpiece of the Government on Thursday. "Her Majesty's Government," said that mouthpiece, "are by no means satisfied that there is any serious foundation for any one of these allegations" regarding the inability of the tenants to pay rent. No evidence in support of that assertion had been adduced by the Government; but on the other side they had abundant evidence to show that the tenants, owing to the fall in the price of agricultural produce, could not meet their legal obligations. Thom's Almanac for 1886 gave an estimate of the gross value of the principal crops which Ireland produced. It showed for a period of seven years the average prices which had been obtained by the 10 principal agricultural products—wheat, oats, barley, rye, peas and beans, flax, turnips, mangold-wurzel, beetroot, and hay. From 1878 to 1884 wheat fell from £1,153,000 to £495,000; oats fell from £7,617,000 to £7,243,000; barley fell from £1,567,000 to £1,070,000; rye fell from £57,000 to £29,000; peas and beans fell from £98,000 to £81,000; flax fell from £1,419,000 to £1,002,000; turnips fell from £2,811,000 to £2,104,000; mangold-wurzel from £514,000 to £329,000. In 1874 there was comparative wealth in the country; in 1884 there was comparative poverty. In spite of those facts, they still found Ministers rising in their place to declare that it was only in the matter of butter that the prices of agricultural produce had fallen in Ireland. Nothing had increased in value in the last seven years, according to Thom, except the staple commodity, potatoes, in regard to which there had been a considerable rise from 1878 to 1884; but that did not justify the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that nothing had fallen in price except butter. The agriculturist was in the same position that he was a few years ago. Agricultural depression prevailed to a large extent not in Ireland alone, but in England and Scotland as well. They had evidence of that in the substantial reductions that had been made in England and Scotland by the landlords to the tenant farmers. They had the declarations also made by Gentlemen who sat on the Nationalist Benches that the agricultural condition of Ireland is not what it once was. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at that statement or refuse to accept it; but he said, in good faith, that there were Gentlemen sitting upon those Benches who had a more thorough and intimate knowledge of the agricultural situation in Ireland than any other Gentlemen in that House. They were of the agricultural class themselves; they had to make their own livelihood by the agriculture of Ireland, notwithstanding the sneer thrown across the floor of the House that these Gentlemen lived on the contributions of the servant girls of America. He knew the difficulty many of them had to live out of the produce of the agriculture of Ireland, and they were in a position to guarantee that the agricultural depression was not a myth, but a hard, severe, and sad reality. He must also call the attention of the House to the acknowledgment made by Sir James Caird. If all these declarations were not enough, surely the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to accept the declaration of one of his meekest and most docile associates—a Gentleman now sitting silently at his feet, drinking in lessons of political morality, strategy, and wisdom—a Gentleman who was of enormous use to the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the last Election—a Gentleman, in fact, whose services were so invaluable to the noble Lord, that the noble Lord owed his present position as Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House of Commons to his indefatigable exertions—he referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain). He would say to his British Radical Friends below the Gangway—"These be your Gods, oh Israel!" The right hon. Member for West Birmingham frequently spoke in two voices. He preferred to take the voice which sounded last April, rather than the voice that would probably sound on the floor of the House tomorrow night. In April last Mr. Chamberlain said—

"But we are in the midst of a great and remarkable change in the value of agricultural produce. I am told that this value has fallen in Ireland since the Land Act from 20 to 40 per cent."—(3 Hansard, [304] 1921).

had now practically become rack-rents, he committed himself to this statement as a solution of the case. "I would," he said, "bring in a Bill to stay all evictions for a period of six months." The right hon. Gentleman, in other speeches, also said that there would be no necessity for resorting to repressive measures if they put the cause, in the shape of rack-renting, out of the way. Now, would the noble Member of the Government, who looked to the assistance of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham with such confidence, accept the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, and bring in a Bill to stay evictions for a period of six months, or would the right hon. Gentleman commit himself to a policy that would result in the passing of a Bill for staying immediate evictions in Ireland for a period of six months? He Mr. Crilly, and other hon. Gentlemen would watch with some curiosity to-morrow night to see what action on this question of the staying of evictions the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham would take up. Besides the evidence they had that tenant farmers were unable to pay their rents, they saw that the landlords were ruthlessly proceeding with evictions in Ireland. The noble Lord the Leader of the House had some time ago, speaking to the Orangemen of Belfast, broken into poetry, and told the landlords to "charge with all their chivalry," and the dead which strewed the streets of Belfast attested how well the Orangemen had responded to his appeal. Now, the noble Lord was making an appeal, in antagonism to the popular forces in Ireland, to the landlords to "charge with all their chivalry," and the landlords were responding to that appeal no less nobly than the Orangemen in the streets of Belfast. They might take any paper published in any part of Ireland, and they would find that the landlords, feeling confident they could rely on the Government to back them, were resorting one more to the same old course of eviction, which had been followed by so much disaster and woe in times past. Lord Kenmare, who had to be guarded by so many constables, was responsible in Ireland for the eviction of 300 families; and when 300 men were thrown out on the roadside without shelter for their wives and children, was it likely that these men would be as cool and calm as hon. Gentleman on the Government Benches? Was it wonderful that the man who did this should find it necessary to appeal for protection to the Government of the country? There were hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House who set an example as landlords which would compare very favourably with such men as Lord Kenmare. The same policy prevailed in the West of Ireland. At Woodford a man had been evicted because he owed £16 10s. The result had been that 27 prisoners had been taken to gaol, at a cost of £16 16s. The Resident Magistrate and the police present at the scene offered to subscribe among themselves the sum of £16 10s. due for rent to keep this unfortunate man in his home; but the agent of the property had refused point-blank to accept it, and insisted upon the man being turned out, because there were costs amounting to £17 10s. Was it wonderful, then, that they on those Benches should say that Shylocks were not confined to Venice alone? The whole of the rent owing on two estates in the neighbourhood of Galway, near where this man had been evicted, was £60, and to collect that rent in the present way of proceeding would cost over £1,000. Possibly the agrarian difficulty would not have been so intensified had they followed the example set by some of the landlords of the North of Ireland. He would instance that, at a recent meeting of the Listowel Board of Guardians, 40 eviction papers were laid on the table, dealing with the properties for which a gentleman by the name of Sands was agent. The people of Ireland—the tenant farmers of Ireland—came to that House and asked for bread, and the Government gave them a Royal Commission. The Government were pursuing the same old policy—they were protecting the landlord and deserting the tenant. Did hon. Members know what evictions were like? If they did, and if they had any humanity in their hearts, they would at once and spontaneously vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. As Representatives of the Irish people, they had a right to protest as strongly as they could against the policy of the Government, which was one which must ultimately lead to the imposition upon Ireland of a ruthless and heartless Coercion Bill. Instead of appealing to the people themselves, or to their Representatives, the Government appealed for advice to Gentlemen like the right hon. and gallant Member who had moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Was that Gentleman fitted to give an impartial account of the relations between the landlords and tenants of Ireland? That right hon. and gallant Gentleman was a political turncoat, having formerly been a Home Ruler; and he was also a convicted rack-renter, as shown by the records of the Land Court. In one case his rent was reduced from £90 to £70; in another from £81 to £77, and, on appeal, to £67. In 10 cases on the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's property at Ballymahon, which were brought before the Land Court by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, the rents had been reduced from £510 to £460, a considerable slice taken off; but the misfortunes of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not end in the Sub-Commissioners' Court, for the Head Commissioners, on being appealed to, further reduced it to £414. This Gentleman might be taken as a fair type of many of the landlords in Ireland. It was impossible that the Government should refuse to listen to the Representatives of five-sixths of the Irish people in the policy they wished the Government to adopt, and accept the advice of a landlord who in the Land Commission Courts had been proved to have been for years in the receipt of rack-rents to which no moral law gave him a right or title. The Government might as well expect to get a fair Report on the Belfast riots from a Royal Commission composed of the Rev. Mr. Kane, the Rev. Dr. Hanna, Mr. Haslett, a late Representative of a Division of Belfast in that House, and the Mayor of Belfast. The policy the Government were pursuing was a policy that would inevitably lead them to coercion, and it was a policy which was advised by such right hon. Gentlemen as he had described, to whom the Government had listened, while they had closed their ears to the representations made in the House by the Representatives of the Irish people. The reason why the policy of the Government would tend in the direction of coercion was that as evictions increased crime and outrage would increase. Like the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork, he (Mr.

Orilly) admitted that evictions were no justification for outrage and crime; but they could not get over the fact that there was a certain amount of human nature and human passions in those men who were ejected from their little homesteads, and that the ruthless eviction of tenants increased crime and outrage. But perhaps the explanation of the delay of six months which the Government asked for was that they wanted to come before the House with a positive and definite policy, which they had not got now. If they could come back in February with an increased record of crime and outrage during the winter months they could demand from the House of Commons those necessary repressive measures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of as necessary to give to put down crime and outrage. The noble Lord said that, with the exception of Kerry, the records of crime in Ireland did not differ from what they were in the early part of the year. Why did not crime and outrage increase during the interval between the early part of the year and the present time? It was because the late Government refused to give its sanction and influence to the landlords of Ireland to promote evictions, because it was recognized that they felt in their English human hearts some sympathy with the Irish people, and because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) introduced proposals into that House which disarmed the resentment of the Irish people, and brought the Irish people into closer contact with the English people—and made their hearts warm to the English people—than ever they were before. He told the Members of Her Majesty's Government, as had been told to them already in the course of the discussion, that this policy of coercion would fail to drive out of the hearts of the Irish people those deathless aspirations for legislative independence which at present animated their hearts. It might be said on the other side of the House that National independence—a phrase which had been so frequently quoted in the House—implied total and absolute separation from England. To his mind, honestly speaking, it implied nothing of the kind. It meant that English domination in Ireland should be broken down—not that the influence of England in Ireland as the governing country should be lessened, but that it should cease entirely so far as it was able to direct the social and internal life of the Irish people. It was in that sense that they wished to put an end to English domination in Ireland—it was in that sense that they appealed to England for a measure such as that proposed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; and he told the noble Lord the Leader of the Government, who had shown in his political career that he had the capacity to learn something, that, though young and able as he was, he would never live to see the Irish National demand broken down, and that if he desired, as he ought to desire, to bring peace and prosperity and happiness to Ireland, and to the hearts and homes of the Irish people, it could not be done through the channel of coercion—it could only be done by recognizing the National sentiment and aspirations in the direction of Home Rule, and giving effect to the plea of the Irish people in the direction in which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would have given to them last Session. In conclusion, he would only say that if the Government desired to govern Ireland well and wisely and with justice, he would recommend them to study the words of a brilliant historian—an Irishman; and also, though he had taken the side of the Government lately, he would recommend to them for their approval the words of Mr. Lecky when he said—

"In no other history but that of Ireland can we investigate more fully the natural consequences which must ensue from disregarding that sentiment of nationality which—whether it be wise or foolish, whether it be desirable or the reverse—is at least one of the strongest and most enduring of the human passions."

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) bestowed great praise on the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) for its moderation, and certainly the speech was marked by the hon. Member's characteristic moderation in tone. He imagined that the tone was intended for the benefit of the Imperial Parliament. The substance of the speech, however, was not quite so conciliatory; and that, he supposed, was intended for the consumption of the delegates at the Chicago Convention. He could not be sorry that the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) had shown his hand so openly, or regret that he had frankly called them behind the scenes, because it was exceedingly desirable that the House and the country should understand what was the real motive of the Amendment brought before them. It was not, he believed, brought forward chiefly in order to protect the tenant farmers of Ireland against the oppression of which they had heard so much from the Nationalist Members—its motive was not so much humanitarian as political. The desire of the hon. Member for Cork was to obtain Home Rule for Ireland. How was that to be obtained? By making the government of Ireland by the Imperial Parliament impossible—and the government of Ireland by the Imperial Parliament was to be rendered impossible by a general strike against rents. This policy was by no means a new one on the part of the hon. Member for Cork. For what was it that he took off his coat? Was it in order to assist the tenant farmer? Not at all. For that purpose he declared he would never have taken off his coat. It was by means of the agrarian question that he hoped to obtain legislative independence for Ireland. It was not the interest of the hon. Member for Cork and his followers that there should be a settlement between the Irish landlords and the Irish tenants. Their intention was to use the agrarian question as a lever by which to force Home Rule. If that question were settled, the hon. Member for Cork's trade would be at an end, and he would be an agitator without an occupation. That was the reason why the hon. Member for Cork, again and again, in his speech, insisted that there was no possible settlement of the Land Question apart from the settlement of the question of the government of Ireland. The hon. Member wished to keep open the agrarian sore, so that he might succeed in his ultimate aim. But ought not this very circumstance to inspire the House with the greatest suspicion as to any statements put forward on the agrarian question by the hon. Member for Cork and his followers? The hon. Member invited the House to affirm that, in consequence of the fall in the prices of agricultural produce, it was impossible for the Irish tenants to pay their rent; and he further asked hem to condemn any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed at a time when prices were higher. With regard to this later point, if it were true that the existing rents were fair and just, there would obviously arise no question whatever of calculating a system of State-assisted purchase upon rents which were too high. Her Majesty's Government had stated that, in their opinion, the rents in general were not too high; and, that being so, the House was not called upon to decide upon the abstract question which the hon. Member for Cork had brought forward. He considered that question, in its abstract form, an exceedingly difficult one. It was clear that the Land Act of 1881 was of a very special character, and that it imposed upon the State certain obligations in any future dealings with the Land Question. How far those obligations extended would be a matter requiring most careful consideration; but it was futile for the House to attempt to consider it, unless they had some definite proposal before them. But was it true that the rents were at present too high in Ireland? The hon. Member for Cork gave no reasons to induce the House to think that rents were high; but, on the contrary, merely assumed that it was his business to prove. The hon. Member for North Mayo had endeavoured to supplement this deficiency. It was not denied that, to some extent, prices had fallen; but why did the hon. Member for North Mayo select the year 1878 for the purpose of making comparison between the prices of a former period and those of the present time, seeing that the judicial rents were fixed within the last three or four years? If prices had been falling ever since 1878, that was rather an argument for supposing that the probability of a further fall had been taken into consideration by the Commissioners in fixing the judicial rents. The average prices of staple products in Ireland, at the present time, were in every case higher than those upon which Griffith's valuation was based; and it had been considered well within the truth to say that Griffith's valuation was, on an average, 15 per cent below the fair letting value of Irish property. The average of present rents might be taken to be 10 per cent above Griffith's valuation; so that whereas prices were higher, rents were lower now than at the time of that valuation. Moreover, the prices of the principal articles of consumption had fallen, and were still falling. Tea, tobacco, and flour were lower than at the time of Griffith's valuation, and that consideration ought not to be lost sight of. Look, again, at the deposits in the banks. The deposits both in the savings banks and in other banks were enormously greater now than they were some years ago, and those deposits were largely made by the tenant farmers of Ireland. [Cries of "No!"] If not, how was it that, at the bidding of the Land League, it was possible so effectually to "Boycott" the Munster Bank? [Laughter.]

An hon. MEMBER: That's your knowledge of Ireland; no bank ever was "Boycotted."

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR said, it was further a notorious fact that when legal proceedings had been taken against tenants who had refused to pay their rents, not only the rents but the costs of the proceedings had been paid. There was another cause, besides the pretended inability of the tenants, for the non-payment of rent, and that was the action of the National League—the terrorism under which the tenants were placed. They had been told that evictions and agrarian outrages had been in proportion to each other. He was not certain that the facts would justify the assertion; but if it really was so, he believed the explanation to be this—that there was a common cause both of the outrages and of the evictions, and he believed that cause was the action of the National League itself. In other words, the outrages had taken place in those parts of the country where the National League was most powerful, and the evictions had taken place in the same districts, because the National League had interfered to prevent the tenants from paying their rents. It was not fair to speak of the landlords of the present day in terms that might be applicable to the rack-renting, evicting landlords of generations past. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) made an appeal the other night to the Irish landlords not to insist to the uttermost farthing upon their legal rights. Every Member on that side of the House would cordially join in that appeal; but he did not believe it was needed. He could not believe that the Irish landlords were so blind at the present time to the fact that their position imposed duties no less than it conferred privileges. These duties had, unfortunately, been made very much more distasteful and their performance greatly discouraged by the action partly of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and partly also of the hon. Member for Cork. Of all the defects of the Land Act of 1881, one of the gravest was the serious blow dealt at the friendly relations between landlords and tenants. The Commission which the Government proposed to appoint had been criticized as if its whole business were to examine into the question of rents, and to determine whether they were or were not too high. He did not understand that it was limited to that scope; but, even if it were, its appointment would have been fully justified. The Government held certain views with regard to rents in Ireland. If they were wrong, it was exceedingly desirable they should be made sensible of their error. If they were right, it was equally desirable that the correctness of their judgment should be made manifest to the country at large, and the hollowness exposed of a protest put forward, not that justice might be done between landlord and tenant, but to provide fuel for the maintenance at red heat of a mischievous political agitation.

Mr. JAMES STUART Shoreditch, (Hoxton) said, on one occasion he had been showing a friend the beauties of a particular district of Scotland, when the latter remarked to him that there seemed to be only one subject of universal interest, and that was the sacred subject of whisky. In the same way it might be said that there was only one subject of universal interest on the Ministerial Benches—namely, the sacred subject of rents. He supported the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork Mr. Parnell, because he thought it was most important that some expression of opinion should go forth from this House deprecating evictions, and that some sympathy should be uttered by other than Irish Members for the sufferings and hardships which the tenants of Ireland underwent. It had been admitted by nearly every speaker that the prices of agricultural produce had fallen since the judicial rents had been fixed, and it was contended by the hon. Member for

Cork that this had rendered the payment of those judicial rents impossible. On this point the testimony of Irish Members both above and below the Gangway was unanimous, and completely overbore the assertions of the Representatives of the landlords upon the other side of the House, and rendered it unnecessary to appoint a Commission to inquire into the question. The time was coming when the margin between the amount that the tenant got out of the land and the amount of the rent would have to be extended at the expense of the rent, so as to secure the prosperity of the great body of the people. The object aimed at by this Amendment was to have a fair bargain and a just one. There were some things which might be very good logically, but which you could not carry out; and he would like to see a Government which would endeavour to pay the rack rents of Irish landlords out of the pockets of the working classes of this country. He doubted whether the present or any other Government would be so silly as to put that proposal before the House of Commons in the form of a definite legislative measure. They could not forget that the Land Questions in England and Ireland were far more closely connected than some hon. Members believed. He thought the people of this country were learning something from their Irish friends as to what was the just claim of the tenants in regard to landlords. It was said, however, that they must not deal with the difficulty in Ireland in consequence of the bogus theory about the Act of 1881 being a guarantee to the landlords. The working classes of England were of opinion that the land system of Ireland was one of the principal causes of the trouble in which we were at present placed. But his Irish Friends must not suppose he thought that their demands could be satisfied by a solution of the Land Question. If the Amendment were not carried what would happen? If the sentiments which he and others held were true the sad series of events would happen that was predicted by his hon. Friend the Member for Cork. The Party opposite were going steadily towards coercion. Depend upon it they would have to deal with coercion when they met again. He should be glad if the country could escape from the misfortunes which that proposal would entail upon them. If there were one thing certain from the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian it was that the mass of the Liberal Party in this country would not tolerate coercion in Ireland; and if Ireland were not to be governed by coercion he was of opinion that that country must have the government of its own affairs. In the meanwhile he hoped that some modus vivendi might be established such as was suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Cork.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, it was difficult for Irish Members to take part in this debate. The ruling from the Chair had placed narrow bounds to the flights of their fancy. In the few remarks he intended to make he should try to confine himself strictly to the terms of the Amendment. One thing was pretty clear—namely, that the Irish landlords would be judged by the country after this debate to be not so black as they had been painted. He thought they had a right to be thankful and satisfied that their reputations had not as yet been much tarnished by the accusations of hon. Members opposite below the Gangway. He would not have trespassed on the time of the House but for one reason, which he would state presently, because he had noticed manifestations which showed that the House considered that the discussion had lasted long enough. [Cries of "No!" from the Home Rule Benches.] He knew very well that hon. Members below the Gangway were not tired of debate; but he should not have ventured upon the time of the House on the present occasion were it not that he occupied the happy position of being an Irish landlord. If no Irish landlord rose in the course of the debate their silence would furnish an admirable text for hon. Gentlemen opposite when they revisited Ireland and addressed their constituents. They would say that these landlords—these bloodsuckers, as they were pleased to call the class on the other side of the water—declined to get up in the House of Commons and accept the challenge that had been thrown down to them. He would be able to show that there was at any rate one landlord in Ireland who was not the least afraid to take up their challenge on this or any other point. Hon. Members opposite had made some uncomplimentary remarks about the class to which he belonged. He came into the House when the Member for East Galway (Mr. Harris) was speaking, and the hon. Member made use of the following phrase:—"The landlords were an abominable class." Well, he was prepared to do justice to the hon. Member, and to say that he had always been consistent in his views upon this matter, because, looking back at a speech which he had made six years ago, he held exactly the same views, and it would be admitted that six years in these days was a great strain upon political consistency. Speaking on October 24, 1880, at Galway, the hon. Member said—

"And when I see this extermination, and when I see the weakness of our people, and when I see tyranny triumphing over right and justice, and when I see my countrymen driven to the four winds of heaven, I say to myself—and I say it here to-day—that if the tenant farmers of Ireland shoot down landlords as partridges are shot in the month of September, Mat Harris never would say one word against it."

This clearly showed that the hon. Member had been consistent in all along maintaining the same political view about landlords. If the Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had been passed into law and if a Parliament were sitting in Dublin, of which the hon. Gentleman would doubtless have been a distinguished Member, he asked the House what the position of Irish landlords would be under such a régime? He would tell the House exactly what the position would be. Hon. Members opposite—

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) (who had just entered the House: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. and gallant Member has made an allusion to a speech of mine. May I ask your permission, Sir, to answer any statement the hon. and gallant Member made with regard to myself?

AN HON. MEMBER: Ask him to repeat it.

MR. HARRIS: May I ask the hon. and gallant Member to repeat what he said?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: With the greatest possible pleasure. This is the report of a speech delivered by the hon. Member on October 24, 1880, in Galway, and this is what he said—I presume it is correct; of course I was not there myself—

“And when I see this extermination, and when I see the weakness of our people, and when I see tyranny triumphing over right and justice, and when I see my countrymen driven to the four winds of heaven, I say to myself—and I say it here to-day—that if the tenant farmers of Ireland shoot down landlords as partridges are shot in the month of September, Mat Harris would never say one word against it.”

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. and gallant Gentleman read what I said before that?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: That is the only part of the speech that is worth repeating.

Mr. HARRIS again rose; but Colonel Saunderson did not give way. [Cries of “Order!”]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. and gallant Gentleman does not give way, he is in possession of the House. No doubt, if the hon. Member wishes to make a personal explanation, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will give way to him.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to make an explanation, I shall with your permission, Sir, be most happy to give way to him.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker, previous to using the language which the hon. and gallant Member has quoted, I stated that in the years 1843 and 1844 I had gone out to the Ribbon Lodges in Westmeath endeavouring to put down agrarian crime in Ireland, and that after the efforts I had made, and through the instrumentality of others as well as myself, agrarian crime having been put down, the exterminators came in. I put it to the House now whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has spoken, or any other Member in this House except myself, has ever gone out at the risk of his life to put down agrarian crime in Ireland? I am perfectly well aware that using such language—[Cries of “Order!”]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, by the indulgence of the House, is entitled to make a personal explanation, but not an argumentative speech.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The hon. Member has not denied the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. HARRIS: Read the context.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: As far as I understand the explanation, the hon.

Member now informs the House of an interesting fact which I was not aware of before—namely, that he belongs to the Ribbon Organization.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. and gallant Member is entitled to accuse the hon. Member of belonging to the Ribbon Organization?

Mr. HARRIS: I endeavoured to put down that Organization.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not an accusation, but a statement that the hon. Member has admitted a certain fact. It is for the House to judge.

Mr. DILLON: The hon. Member did not admit anything of the sort.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, if the hon. Member repudiates the statement, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will accept his repudiation.

Mr. HARRIS: I call upon the hon. and gallant Member to withdraw the statement. I repudiate it as being a most infamous falsehood.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must withdraw that expression unreservedly.

Mr. HARRIS (without rising): I withdraw it.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I extremely regret that I caused any annoyance to the hon. Gentleman. [Cries of “Withdraw!”] The hon. Member informed the House—

Mr. HARRIS: Is the expression going to be withdrawn?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I have nothing to withdraw. The hon. Member himself speaks of his having been to Ribbon Lodges.

Mr. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of Order. The hon. and gallant Gentleman stated that my hon. Friend the Member for East Galway had admitted himself to be a member of the Ribbon Organization. My hon. Friend distinctly says he never was, and I submit, therefore, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman is bound to withdraw the charge he has brought against my hon. Friend.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I never made a charge.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it must be the wish of the House that these personal recriminations should cease. I am sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman will accept the repudiation.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he accepted it absolutely. At the same time, however, he thought that if he stated in this House the fact—and he was not ashamed to state it—that he occasionally visited Orange Lodges, the inference would naturally be that he was an Orangeman. Still, he had no intention to irritate the hon. Member, and if he had done so he apologized. This debate would be of considerable value to Irish landlords. It seemed as if a new canon had been added to the moral code—namely, “Thou shalt not ask for rent.” [An Irish MEMBER: Unjust rent.] And it would appear that to ask for rent placed a man outside the pale of civilization. He asked for rent very much as a butcher asked for the payment of his bill. Irish landlords had undoubtedly been brought down to a considerably lower level than that which they had occupied in the past, and, recognizing this, they were quite ready to take their stand alongside butchers and bakers, and only asked that the law should give them the same protection as it afforded to men in positions of that kind. The hon. Member who had preceded him in the debate objected to what he termed the proposal “to bolster up a class in a bloated condition.” He could assure the hon. Member that the word “bloated” did not apply, in a pecuniary sense at any rate, to Irish landlords. All trades, professions, and occupations in Ireland were unfortunately in a more or less depressed condition, except one, and that was the occupation of professional politician. If one was to believe the information conveyed through the Press, the trade or occupation or profession of an Irish politician was never in so prosperous a condition as it was just now. There was, no doubt, great depression in Ireland as there was in England and Scotland. But what happened to the holding and owning of land in Ireland in 1881 was this. The State stepped in and made a bargain between the tenant and the landowner, which was to last for 15 years. Before that the landlord and the tenant were absolutely free to deal together. But the State stepped in—he did not object to that—and made what was called a bargain for the tenant, because it was stated that the tenant was not in a position to make a bargain for himself. The debates during the passing of the Bill he had carefully read, and he remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) stated that the landlords, when the Land Act was passed, would be in a better position than they were at that time. He said that they would be better off by getting a small rent that would be regularly paid, than if they attempted to collect large rents that could not be ensured. Even before the Act of 1881 rents were not so high in Ireland as in England; and the result of that measure was that they were reduced by from 20 to 25 per cent. The Land Commissioners had fixed the rents to be paid for 15 years, and the Commissioners took into account the possibility of future depression when they fixed the rents. [Home Rule cries of “No!”] Well, some of the Commissioners might not have taken that into consideration. Very stupid men were made Commissioners, who knew no more about land than they did about Chinese, and who were appointed simply because they preferred a certain leading statesman rather than another. An hon. Member who had acted as Assistant Commissioner had told the House that he did not take the possibility of future depression into consideration. That only showed that the hon. Gentleman was not fit for the post. The rule, however, was that the Commissioners should bear in mind the possibility of depression.

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR: What rule?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that it was a well understood thing that there was a rule by which the Commissioners took into consideration the fall of prices when fixing rents.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.) said, he desired to make an explanation. He did not think he had said that the Commissioners did not take into account the possibility of a future fall in prices. What he had said was that, judging by the past, the Commissioners looked forward to a period of prosperity before the next period of depression, and that they did not contemplate the very great and unexpected depression which had supervened.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that the explanation of the hon. Member only made his case stronger, because it showed that all the Commissioners without exception took the question of future depression into consideration. Now, was it fair that that House should pass a measure which should secure to the tenants the benefit of any possible inflation in the price of produce, but which should not hold good if prices were to fall? If there had been a great rise in prices there would have been no attempt made to remodel the judicial rent. On the face of it the present suggestion to lower rents was unfair; it was a policy all through of 'heads I win; tails you lose.' He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the Government intended to make rent recoverable. The recovery of debt was part of the law of the land; and if the Government did not enforce the payment of rent how were they to enforce the payment of debt on account of any other claim? Some hon. Gentlemen opposite saw in this declaration on the part of the Government that they wished the landlords to extract the utmost farthing in the way of rent. Personally, he did not think that the feeling that he had the law at his back would make the landlord harder or more exacting. He as a landlord had never acted upon that principle. "Oh!" and laughter. Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but he would not mind appealing to the hon. Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to give him a character for not being a harsh landlord [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!]. What was the object that the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends had in view? They wanted to exterminate the race of Irish landlords; but knowing that they could not be got rid of by open acts of legislation, that democratic level not having yet been reached in that House, they desired to get rid of the class of landlords by the practical device of telling the tenants not to pay rent, and there was an Organization to back those who refused to pay their rents. Special reference had been made to the evictions on the property of Captain Hill at Gweedore, and it therefore was right to put the House in possession of the facts. This was a remarkable property. There were 765 tenants upon it, and the gross rental was £798. It, therefore, could not be considered an enviable property. Some of the tenants only paid half-a-crown per annum, and none paid more than £4, and in all cases the landlord paid the rates. The men eked out their livelihood by going to England and elsewhere to do harvesting and other work, and they left their wives and children at home to cultivate the potato patches and the small fields of oats. When they returned to their native town, they spent the money they had earned in England. [AN IRISH MEMBER: In paying the rent.] He ventured to say that there were thousands, nay millions, of workmen in this country, whose homes were in the back slums of London and other by-cities, who would most willingly change places with the labourers of Gweedore. This property was an Irish exemplification of what was proposed to be done in England, only on a smaller scale, because few of the tenants had three acres, and fewer still a cow. These tenants were in possession of what were practically accommodation allotments, and figures which he could quote showed that their holdings were not at all contemptuously regarded. He held in his hand a list of the prices given in the immediate past for the tenant right of some of the small holdings, and he asked the House to observe that these were the unfortunate people who were represented to be absolutely incapable of paying a farthing of rent. He thought some of the values would rather astonish the House. A great number of the Irish, English, and Scotch landlords would be delighted to sell their property as a whole upon the terms which he should quote. Last year James Boyle had to leave his holding, which he rented at 15s. a-year, and for the tenant right a woman named Ellen Cole paid £100. Another case was that of Nellie O'Donnell, whose rent was £1 6s., and who sold her holding to Edward Campbell for £108. A third holding, whose rent was 6s. 3d. a-year, fetched £80 for tenant right. Now, when the House heard the glowing description of the Home Rule Members of the desperate tyranny of Captain Hill in asking his tenants to pay rent, and when it heard of these immense sums being paid for these very holdings, it would think that there was something wrong somewhere. He was going to tell the House where that somewhere was. There was a branch at Gweedore of the National League, and its president was the Rev. Mr. M'Fadden, parish priest. Now, as parish priest and president of the National League, Mr. M'Fadden was monarch of all he surveyed. The rev. gentleman got to loggerheads with the owner of the estate, and the result was that the branch of the National League at Gweedore gave orders that Captain Hill's tenants should on no account take any employment from the owner of the hotel which Captain Hill had himself built to improve the place, and that they should not take any engagement with the lessees of the salmon fisheries, who had also incurred Mr. M'Fadden's indignation. Yet hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway would get up and say that these evictions were proof positive of the grinding character of the tyranny exercised over Irish tenants by the blood-sucking landlords. The House would have to learn, if it had not yet learnt it, that in many cases, such as that at Gweedore, evictions were the result, not of a fight between the landlords and tenants, but of a stand up fight between the landlords and their enemy the National League. That was pretty much the condition of things that existed in Ireland at the present time. Reverting to the question of rents he wished to inquire how it was that far higher rents than were now asked for were paid in Ireland from 1852 to 1881? Notwithstanding what was now said about depression of prices they were much lower then than they were now. Wheat was not grown much in Ireland, but he found that in 1852 the price was 7s. 6d. per cwt., whereas in 1885 it was 8s. 3d. Oats had risen from 4s. 10d. to 8s. per cwt. Pork, to which he would especially call the attention of the hon. Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar), had gone up from 32s. to 46s. per cwt., beef from 35s. 6d. to 55s., and butter from 65s. to 95s. ["No!" and cries of "Where?"] At Cork, which was celebrated for two marketable commodities, butter and Home Rule Members. As regarded the latter commodity, Cork was in the favourable position of supplying between 20 and 30 Members to the Party below the Gangway opposite, and perhaps that accounted for the similarity of tone, sound, and argument that was distinguishable among them. With regard to butter, he saw in the papers that "firsts" had fallen to 11d. and "seconds" to 10d. per lb. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite contended that butter had fallen to something like 5d. per lb., but that was butter that would never have fetched any price, and was only fit to adulterate butterine. In the opinion of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite there was only one standard for Irish rents, and that was the prairie value. That was the settlement those hon. Gentlemen ultimately contemplated. The word "prairie" had a sweet and pleasant sound. It brought to our minds green fields and flowers; but according to hon. Gentlemen opposite "prairie value" meant the value of Irish land before Irishmen ever put a spade or a plough into it. In those early times only plover, snipe, and such things were to be found on the Irish soil—[An hon. MEMBER: Landlords]—and hon. Gentlemen opposite would have to go back and find out the value of plover and snipe in the time of Brian Boru. He did not think the House of Commons would ever listen to a settlement on a basis such as that, and he was happy to say that the vote at the last Election had finally, he believed for our time at least, decided that the Irish Land Question and the Irish Question in general should never be settled by a Parliament sitting in College Green. He now came to the last part of the Amendment. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) yesterday, in his remarkable and, he would say, very impressive speech, wound up by letting the cat out of the bag as to the meaning of this Amendment. At the end of his speech the hon. Member informed the House that there would be crime and outrage in Ireland in the coming winter. Hon. Members might sometimes have seen an engine-driver with the throttle-valve in his hand, which he could turn at will and admit the steam or shut it off. If he admitted the steam the machine performed its functions. So the hon. Member for Cork was in the same position—he held the throttle-valve of crime in Ireland. He had turned it on before, he could do so again. [Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

[Fifth Night.]

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) wished to know if the hon. and gallant Member was in Order in imputing to the hon. Member for Cork the incitement to crime by saying that he in the past had practically brought crime about by turning on the throttle-valve of crime?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman would not be in Order if he intended to impute to the hon. Member for Cork that he had brought about crime in Ireland. [Cries of "Withdraw!"]

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I am expressing my opinion. This is not an Assembly sitting in College Green. Loud Parnellite cries of "Withdraw, withdraw!"

MR WILLIAM REDMOND: Sir, I rise to Order again.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I have nothing to withdraw. I have stated my opinions, and I have based them upon a foundation which, I believe, cannot be shaken. Renewed cries of "Withdraw!" If the House will allow me, as I have been directly challenged as to the accuracy of my statements, I will read to the House—

MR WILLIAM REDMOND: I rise to Order. The hon. and gallant Member who has just been addressing the House distinctly stated in the plainest language that the hon. Member for Cork could stay crime when he liked and that in the past he had turned on the throttle-valve of crime. I wish to know whether that statement is in Order, imputing as it does to the hon. Member for Cork the incitement to crime in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman intends by the expression he made use of to impute to the hon. Member for Cork the act of having turned on crime at his pleasure, I do not consider that it would be a Parliamentary expression, and I think it should be withdrawn.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that in obedience to the ruling of the Chair he would withdraw the expression. A very remarkable speech was made some years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). In that speech the right hon. Gentleman made the following remarks:—

"Circumstances occurred which drew attention to the Irish Church. . . . When it came to this, that a great gaol in the heart of the Metropolis was broken open under circumstances which drew the attention of the English people to the state of Ireland, and when in Manchester policemen were murdered in the execution of their duty, at once the whole country became alive to Irish questions, and the question of the Irish Church revived. It came within the range of practical politics."

Two months after, on the 15th of January, 1880, a speech was made in America, from which he quoted the following passages:—

"Mr. Gladstone, in one of his Mid Lothian addresses, said that it was not until a policeman had been shot at Manchester by a Fenian and Clerkenwell Prison had been blown up that the Irish Church Question came within the domain of practical English politics."

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I rise to Order. I wish to ask whether what the hon. and gallant Member is now saying comes within the scope of the Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: It remains to be seen how the hon. and gallant Member is going to apply his remarks.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that hon. Members would not wait for the application. He believed that hon. Members—even those most opposed to his views—would see that it had a direct bearing upon the question. The quotation continued as follows:—

"He admitted in that way that you have to act upon English public opinion in some extraordinary and unusual manner in order to obtain any attention for the Irish Question. We are, therefore, obliged to make the situation a very hot one indeed. We desire to restrain this movement within the strict letter of the law, and we have strong hopes of passing over this winter without much bloodshed or suffering; but it is impossible to suppose that the great cause can be won without shedding a drop of blood."

That was the application placed by the hon. Member for Cork upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The hon. Member came over to Ireland and made the situation a very hot one indeed—a hot one in the sense in which he spoke in commenting upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He would leave to the House, to every right-thinking man within those walls, the invention of an epithet that would adequately describe such a course as that. But what was the meaning of the Amendment? There was to be crime in the winter; and the Amendment, if carried, would in the eyes of the public place upon the shoulders of the Irish landlords who would be provoked to evict the sons of that crime. The Amendment meant that if crime occurred in Ireland the blame for it would be shifted from the shoulders of the hon. Member for Cork and placed upon those of the landlords. Did the hon. Member for Cork and his followers think that they were dealing with an abject and craven Government? He thought that before many months were over they would make, to them, the very painful discovery that these threats of crime, which after all he believed dwelt only in the imagination of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, would not paralyze the hands of the Government and induce them, as the late Government appeared to have been induced, to hand over the government of Ireland to the Irish National League. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been severely criticized on the manner in which British money was about to be spent. Hon. Gentlemen opposite objected to the Irish people accepting a gift from the people of this country on any terms. It would degrade them—it would debauch the morality of Ireland. For his own part he did not see that English gold was more debasing in its character than American dollars. He had every confidence that if the Government at present in Office dealt firmly and justly and generously with Ireland the tenant farmers, who were now getting heartily sick of this agitation, which filled the pockets of politicians and denuded their own, would believe at last that England meant to be just to Ireland, and that England would be generous, not, as in the past, at Irishmen's expense, but by putting her hand into her own pocket, and would show that she felt she had a debt to pay to Ireland. He admitted that much. He confessed that in looking back upon the history of English dealing with Ireland by Governments of all kinds he was of opinion that they had put the parable of the good Samaritan into effect, only slightly inverted. They first knocked Ireland down, and when they saw her wounded and bleeding by the wayside, their conscience pricked them, and they seized the first Irishman who passed that way with money in his pockets and floeced him of the money that was to heal the wound. The English people were beginning to realize that they must turn over a new leaf and deal with Ireland on other principles; and he believed that if they did, no matter what hon. Gentlemen opposite might say or do, Ireland would prove grateful to the country that really had her welfare at heart.

MR. HARRIS: As a matter of personal explanation I wish to state that at the conclusion of the speech to which the hon. and gallant Member referred I asked the people I was addressing not to interpret my language as inciting them to the commission of crime—that not only was I opposed to the shedding of human blood, but that I was actually opposed to the shedding of the blood of the lower animals. I trust that this will exculpate me from the charge of inciting to crime.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.), said, he did not know whether the landlords of Ireland would feel complimented by the hon. and gallant Member comparing them to butchers; but he was afraid there were some landlords in Ireland who were as truly murderers as any criminal who ever stood in the dock, for

“ You take my life
When you do take the means whereby
I live.”

The right hon. Member for Lincolnshire seemed to linger at the door of the Cabinet closed against him, and to humble himself in the dust before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as if he indulged a hope that a place might possibly be found for him hereafter. The most pressing of Irish questions was that of evictions, which would increase in number and in severity. If nothing were done, and if the position of the Government were not modified, a condition of things would arise which would overtax all our resources. He was anxiously waiting to hear the views of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). He was curious to learn the attitude of the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness (Mr. Caine), who did not now pass through the Lobbies with that bustling air with which they were all familiar. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who had always held himself out as a special providence watching over the interests of the British taxpayer, had subsided into a pensive melancholy. Would the policy of stern, vigorous, and merciless eviction be supported by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who last April said he would inquire into the merits of the case put forward on behalf of the tenantry, and would, in the meantime, pass a Bill to stop evictions, and would, if necessary, give outdoor relief? This plan, at all events, had the merit that it made inquiry go first. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, said that although there was a case for inquiry, evictions were meanwhile to be enforced with all the rigour of the law, and then, if the Commission reported in favour of the tenantry, relief was to be given them. This was like saying to every evicting landlord—"What thou doest, do quickly." Those who stood most in need of relief were those to whom it would be refused. He implored the Government to remember the consequences of the rejection of the Compensation for Disturbances Bill in 1880. The present condition of Ireland was very similar to what it was in the autumn of that year, when a Bill which would practically have had the effect of stopping evictions was thrown out by the House of Lords. The Government would do well to remember the wild justice of revenge that followed the unchecked evictions of that period, and to keep in their minds the blood-bought lessons of the past. It was absurd to say that to speak of these things was to bring about the fulfilment of your own prophecies, because if they were not to be spoken of we should be estopped from the use of all argument founded upon experience. He appealed to the Government to be wise in time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Joseph Chamberlain).—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howell, Bill to consolidate, simplify, and amend the Law relating to Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howell, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. Picton.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 39.]

House adjourned at half after Five o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—ASSISTANT REVISING BARRISTERS.

Mr. LEWIS (Londonderry) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the appointment of assistant revising barristers in Ireland this year was made by the Lord Lieutenant on the 2nd of August; whether that was many days after the resignation of the late Prime Minister; whether such appointment was made many days before the similar appointments were made last year; whether such appointments were made appointing the several barristers to particular constituencies, instead of leaving the barristers to arrange with the county chairmen, as prescribed by the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament; and, whether one of the assistant revising barristers so appointed was a defeated candidate at the recent General Election?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it had not been the invariable practice of successive Governments in Ireland, whether Liberal or Tory, to exercise, before going out of Office, any patronage they had in the way of existing vacancies; and whether, in relation to the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, to the effect that one of the Assistant Revising Barristers was a candidate at the recent General Election, it was not the fact that one of the Assistant Revising Barristers appointed by the Conservative Government was also a defeated candidate at the General Election in 1885?

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, he also wished to ask whether it was not the fact that last January several executive acts, such as the appointment of magistrates, were performed by the Government of Lord Salisbury up to the resignation of the Ministry?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): In answer to the Question which has been put by the hon. Member for Londonderry (MR. LEWIS), I have to say that the late Lord Lieutenant appointed 28 Revising Barristers on the 2nd of August, which was some days subsequent to the resignation of the late Prime Minister and some time before the date that similar appointments were made last year. One of the gentlemen appointed had been a candidate at the General Election. I am informed that the Lord Lieutenant's warrants appointed Barristers for counties generally and not for particular constituencies; but in some instances the letters enclosing the warrants stated that a Barrister was appointed for a particular division. In answer to the Questions put by hon. Gentlemen opposite I am not in a position to state what the practice of successive Governments has been, for my knowledge does not extend over many successive Governments, but I know that appointments have been made in the way suggested. As to the further Question as to a gentleman having been appointed last year who had contested a constituency, I am not aware that any gentleman who addressed a constituency as a candidate was appointed subsequently to his having done so. One gentleman who had acted as Revising Barrister was subsequently a candidate, but at the time he was appointed he had never in any way come forward as a candidate for Parliamentary representation, and I have his assurance for saying that at the time he accepted the appointment he had no intention of doing so.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: He was a member of the Constitutional Club.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—GALWAY ASSIZES (SLIGO).

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the rule adopted in the other three provinces of Ireland, of holding the assizes in the chief city of the province, is departed from in the case of Connaught, where the assize is held in Sligo instead of Galway; and, whether the present arrangement will be altered?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, that no such rule as that stated in the Question existed as to the places for holding the Winter Assizes, which depended upon considerations of convenience.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—CAVALRY SADDLES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If he will state how many Cavalry saddles, pattern 1884, have been made, how many issued, how many returned, how many condemned, either returned or unissued; and, whether any steps have been taken to recover damages from the contractors who have supplied defective saddles; and, if not, why not?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (MR. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter): Of 1884 pattern 3,692 saddles were made. Of these 2,627 were issued, including 50 for Canada. None have been condemned as unserviceable. About 150 have been returned damaged by regiments. All the rest have been recalled. The issue of these saddles was made rather as an experiment than as a regular issue; some defects, however, were discovered when they came into use, and modifications and further trials have since been made. The saddles will be re-issued when the modifications of their present pattern, which are now under consideration, are finally approved; but as the present pattern was passed by its Inspectors the War Office is not able to recover damages from the contractors.

SEEDS (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENTS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether about ninety-five per cent. of the money advanced under the Seeds Bill has been repaid, and if the collection of the remaining five per cent. is attended with considerable difficulties to the unions responsible for it; whether the information in his possession shows that these difficulties are caused partly by the fact that the inhabitants of the unions in debt are poorer than the average, and partly because the magistrates at Petty Sessions have some doubt as to their jurisdiction, owing to the lapse of time, while the Quarter Sessions, who have jurisdiction, require proof of delivery; and, if, under these circumstances, he would inquire as to what portion of the balance is fairly recoverable, and if he would request the Local Government Board to see if an arrangement could be made by which, on the unions paying a share of the balance owing, the remainder might be wiped out and the account closed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): Between 92 and 93 per cent of the loan has been repaid. In many cases the difficulty in obtaining payment has arisen rather from indisposition on the part of the recipients of the seed than from positive inability to pay for what they received. No doubt the inhabitants of some of the Unions still in debt are poorer than in Unions where the rate has been fully paid up; but there would be evident objections to selecting any particular Unions with a view to remission. I am not aware of any reason for such a doubt on the part of magistrates with regard to their jurisdiction as is suggested. Magistrates are bound by law to adjudicate on poor rate cases "at any time after the date of the warrant authorizing the collection." As for proof of delivery, the signed receipts of the recipients have been produced when asked for, but the Local Government Board are not aware of any general demand of this kind. My Predecessor in Office announced last March a concession on the part of the Treasury by which the uncollected balance will not be pressed for until the month of April next year.

IRELAND—STATISTICS OF POPULATION—CORK COUNTY.

Mr. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, R.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the population of the county of Cork; what is the proportion of Catholics and Protestants in that county; what is the number of magistrates in that county; how many are Protestants and how many are Catholics; and, how long has Lord Bandon, the present Lieutenant of the County, held that office, and how many Catholic and Protestant magistrates has he appointed during his Lieutenantancy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): With regard to the population and religious professions of the inhabitants of the county of Cork I fear I cannot add anything to the information already before the House in the Census tables. Also, with regard to the number of magistrates of each religious persuasion the House is in possession of all the information at the disposal of the Government, an elaborate Return having been presented in June last on the Motion of the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance). The present lieutenant of the county has been in office for nearly 12 years, and of the magistrates now in the Commission who were appointed by him 118 are Episcopalian Protestants and 49 Roman Catholics.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): In connection with the last Question may I ask whether the Return to which the right hon. Baronet referred distinguishes between those magistrates who were Protestant and those who were Catholic?

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I believe it does. I believe that was the object of the Return.

ARMY CONTRACTS—SUPPLY OF ARMY CLOTHING.

Mr. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What steps are taken to notify to manufacturers in Ireland periodically the intention of Government to receive tenders for the supply of Army clothing?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: In answer to the hon. Member I have to state that there are only two firms in Ireland who are known to be capable of undertaking contracts for the making up of Army clothing—one in Dublin and one in Limerick, and these firms are applied to whenever supplies are required. If any other competent firms wish to tender they have only to apply to have their names placed upon the list, when particulars will be sent to them from time to time.

Mr. HOOPER inquired whether it would not be to the advantage of the Public Service that the information should be furnished to all well known firms of manufacturers in Ireland; and also whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that one of the most eminent firms in this branch of business was now excluded—namely, Messrs. Mahony and Co., of Blarney?

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked if he understood the hon. Gentleman to say that there were only two firms in Ireland capable of fulfilling contracts of this kind?

Mr. NORTHCOTE said, he stated that if any firms wished to tender for such contracts, and if they would signify their wish to the War Office their cases would be considered, and forms of tender would be sent to them from time to time. He was not aware of the circumstances with regard to the firm which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hooper) mentioned, but if the hon. Member would communicate any facts he would see that inquiry was made.

Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.) asked if the hon. Gentleman would state what steps were to be taken by any firms who might consider themselves competent to tender for the supply of Army clothing, and to have their names placed on the list?

Mr. NORTHCOTE said, that in regard to all tenders the course adopted was to advertise in the local papers. There were also firms which were in the regular list of the War Office to which special notices were sent. If the local firms who saw the advertisements which appeared from time to time in the local papers would communicate with the Secretary of State for War, their communications would be attended to in the proper course.

Mr. MAHONY asked if they were to understand that in future all supplies for Army clothing would be advertised in the Irish local papers?

Mr. NORTHCOTE said, he had no reason to suppose that any course different from that which had hitherto been found convenient was likely to be pursued, which consisted in notifying from time to time as supplies were wanted in the principal local papers and to the firms which were accustomed to supply the Department.

PUBLIC HEALTH — HYDROPHOBIA — M. PASTEUR'S RESEARCHES.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK (London University asked the President of the Local Government Board, What progress is being made by the Committee appointed last Session to inquire and report on the subject of M. Pasteur's researches with reference to the prevention of hydrophobia; and, whether the Report of the Committee will be shortly presented to this House?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am informed that considerable progress has been made by the Committee. A Subcommittee visited Paris, and had several long interviews with M. Pasteur, who explained to the members most fully and unreservedly the whole details of his treatment. The Committee examined a large number of the persons who had undergone treatment, and so far as this investigation is concerned the Committee were fully satisfied that M. Pasteur's treatment had been effective. They hope, before long, to be in a position to report the results of their investigation to the Local Government Board; but before doing so they are most anxious that time should be allowed for the Committee to ascertain that experiments on animals, conducted on behalf of the Committee, have yielded the same results as those detailed and demonstrated to them by M. Pasteur.

INDIA (BOMBAY)—CASE OF MR. A. MORTON, PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Andrew Morton, of the Engineering Service, Public Works Department, India, and who was, in 1884, employed on the Nizam of Hyderabad's State Railways; whether Mr. Morton was arrested on a charge of embezzling the Railway funds, and committed by a Colonel Dobbs for trial before the High Court of Bombay, where he was acquitted by the jury without calling on his counsel to reply to the case made against him; whether, subsequently, a Departmental inquiry into Mr. Morton's conduct took place under the presidency of Lieutenant Colonel Bullock, and whether the Committee of Inquiry reported that "the clerks in Mr. Morton's office had combined to deceive him;" that at the time the defalcations with which he was charged occurred "he was overwhelmed with work," having "the duties of Manager, Traffic Superintendent, and Storekeeper, in addition to his other work," and that "his mind was distracted by a multiplicity of duties arising from the arrival and departure of the Viceroy;" and whether the Committee completely exonerated him from being guilty even of gross carelessness; whether, after many months' suspension, being reinstated in his office, he was obliged to proceed to a station in Northern Bengal at his own expense, and his increments of pay stopped down to the present time; and, whether the Indian Government will order that Mr. Morton's incremental pay be restored to him, and that he shall receive suitable compensation for the indignity which he suffered?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham, who replied) said: Mr. Andrew Morton, while employed on the Nizam of Hyderabad's State Railway, was arrested on a charge of embezzlement, and committed for trial before the High Court of Bombay, but the charge was afterwards withdrawn. A Departmental Inquiry took place with the result substantially as stated in the Question. The Committee of Inquiry exonerated him from "the charge of gross negligence," but considered that he had been unbusiness-like in his dealings, especially in regard to documents on which payments of money had to be made. When released and reinstated in his office, the arrears of his pay and the expenses incurred in his defence were passed to him, and he was transferred in the same grade and on the same pay to Bengal. The Government of India, however, thought that his unbusiness-like method could not be passed over, and therefore left him to proceed to his new station at his own expense, and directed that his salary should remain stationary till further orders. The Secretary of State in Council saw no reason to interfere with the discretion of the Government of India in this matter.

EDUCATION IRELAND—BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What proportion of the expense of the administration of the Board of Intermediate Education in Ireland bear to the total income of the Board and to the amount expended yearly in fees to schools and rewards to pupils; whether the two assistant Commissioners discharge duties which might be as efficiently performed by one secretary at less than half the cost; and, if so, whether there is any intention of filling up the vacancy at present existing in the office of assistant Commissioner?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): The proportions mentioned are respectively 10·6 and 21·6 per cent, as will be seen by a reference to the accounts of the Commissioners. The Board do not believe that the duties of the two Assistant Commissioners could be as effectively performed by one Secretary, and the Government agree in this opinion. However, we are in correspondence with the Board as to whether some economies cannot be effected without detriment to the Public Service.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE HERRING FISHERIES ON THE SOUTH COAST.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the practice of fishing for herrings on the South Coast of Ireland before the month of June has been declared by the Inspectors of Fisheries for that Country to be highly detrimental to the fishing industry; and, if so, whether, as the Inspectors have no power to make a bye-law on the subject, he will procure an Order in Council prohibiting the practice complained of within twenty miles of the Irish Coast, thereby following the precedent set by the Order made and approved by Her Majesty on the 29th April 1869, whereby dredging for oysters between certain dates on parts of the East Coast was prohibited within twenty miles of the shore?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): The fact as to the opinion of the Inspectors of Fisheries is as stated by the hon. Member. I will look further into the matter during the Parliamentary Recess and see whether it would be practicable and desirable to promote such an Order in Council as is suggested.

TURKEY—DISTURBANCES IN ARMENIA (VAN).

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received, and can give the House, any information regarding the conflict between a body of Turkish soldiers and the Armenian population of Van, which was reported in the newspapers about three weeks ago as having occurred owing to the interference of the local authorities in the election of an Armenian bishop?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): From a Report received from Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Van, it appears that the disturbances to which my right hon. Friend refers took place on the 4th ultimo, on the occasion of the election of Members to serve in the Armenian National Council of that city. I am glad to be able to say that Mr. Barnham states that the extent of the damage inflicted on both sides has been much exaggerated, and that no serious wounding and no fatality occurred. The interference by the Local Authorities was at the instance of the Acting Bishop. I shall be happy to show to my hon. Friend the Report of the Vice Consul.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND).—THE BELFAST RIOTS—TRIAL OF PRISONERS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the excited state of feeling likely to exist for some time in Belfast, he proposes to permit the two men Walker, returned for trial for the murder of Head Constable Gardiner, to be tried before a Belfast common jury?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I think that at the present moment Belfast would be a very unsuitable place for trying the cases referred to in the Question of the hon. Member; but it is to be hoped that the excited state of feeling there will not continue for any considerable time.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether it is intended to try these prisoners at the coming Winter Assizes?

MR. HOLMES: That is a Question which I cannot answer at the present time, because it is premature to take it into consideration.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: May I further ask whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not consider this a proper case for the exercise of his power of applying to the Queen's Bench to change the venue, as was done by his Predecessor, Mr. Attorney General Johnson, in an agrarian murder case three or four years ago?

MR. HOLMES: I must repeat I cannot answer the Question at the present moment.

THE WEST INDIAN COLONIES—A ROYAL COMMISSION.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, How many estates, sugar and coffee estates principally, have been thrown up and abandoned in the West Indian Colonies by their owners since the introduction of Free Trade and of bounty-paid sugar to Great Britain from the Continent; how many estates have been sold by the Government of the West Indian Colonies under the Incumbered Estates Act; how many estates (with their extent in acres) have been sold by the Government of the West Indian Colonies for Land Tax unpaid; and, whether Her Majesty's Government intends to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of those colonies?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am not able to give the House much information with regard to the first three Questions. The Governments of the West Indian Colonies do not sell estates under the Incumbered Estates Act, but the sales are made by the Incumbered Estates Commissioners on the application of mortgagees and others interested in the estates. A Return of the number of such sales could be obtained from the Commissioners if the House desires it. The other two Returns would be troublesome and expensive, and would have to be obtained from the Colonies. Her Majesty's Government has no intention of appointing a Commission to inquire into the condition of these Colonies. A Royal Commission, appointed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and of which the hon.

and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir William Crossman) and my hon. Friend the Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool (Mr. Baden-Powell) were Members, made an admirable Report on many of these questions in 1882-3.

POST OFFICE.—POSTMASTERSHIPS—THE WELSH LANGUAGE.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in filling up the vacancy in the Post Office at Ruabon and in other Welsh-speaking places in future, he will, where practicable, give the preference to candidates who have a knowledge of the Welsh language?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In answer to my hon. Friend, I may say that some days ago I caused inquiry to be made whether any of the candidates for the vacant postmastership at Ruabon could speak Welsh. There has not been time to obtain the necessary information, and the office will not be filled up till I have considered the point. And I may say, further, that I shall be sincerely glad if, consistently with the requirements of the Public Service, I can adopt the course suggested by my hon. Friend.

CYPRUS—THE ANNUAL TRIBUTE.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government propose to take any steps to capitalise the annual tribute paid by Cyprus to Turkey, in order to lighten the heavy burden pressing upon the inhabitants of Cyprus, and to relieve the English taxpayers of the annual Vote for the Grant in Aid?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): This subject is one of great interest and importance, and is occupying our careful attention. My hon. and gallant Friend knows very well that, however desirable, it is surrounded with much difficulty, and I cannot yet say whether any practicable arrangement can be come to; but we are in communication with the Treasury upon the subject.

ARMY—AGE RETIREMENT.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth), asked the Secretary of State for War, To be so good as to state the precise rule or regulation of the Service under which officers are retired permanently from the Army on account of age; from what date that rule has been in force; whether it has been since that date of universal application; and, whether any exceptions have been made to it; and, if so, in what cases?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Rules as to retirement from the Army on account of age, including exceptions, are embodied in the Royal Warrant of June 10, 1884. They are numerous, and cannot well be given within the limits of an answer to a Question; but the information is within the reach of the hon. Member in the Library, and the Royal Warrant itself is obtainable from Messrs. Clowes, or through any bookseller. The Rules came into force, some in 1877 and others on July 1, 1881, and they have since been strictly followed. The retirement of captains by age has been recently suspended by Royal Warrant of August 10, 1886.

MANDALAY.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has yet received any information which he can communicate to the House in regard to the causes and results of the failure of the bund or embankment, and the flooding of Mandalay; and, whether he can state under what department of the administration and under what officer in particular the responsibility for guarding against such a serious source of danger was vested?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): The following information respecting the recent inundation at Mandalay has been received from the Viceroy:—The breach in the bund is 300 feet wide. Not more than a dozen bodies have been found, as people had plenty of time to clear out of their houses. Total loss of life is probably under 25. No European seems to have been drowned. Much of food stuffs in the bazaar has been destroyed or spoilt; but piece goods were generally saved before the water rose. The obvious cause of the accident was an unprecedented rise of the river. When the flood assumed extraordinary proportions danger was apprehended, and every effort was made to strengthen the embankment. It was also patrolled day and night; but, of course, precautions of this kind are not of much avail if the weight of water is greater than the earth can sustain. The whole of the low-lying parts of the town have been inundated. Arrangements were at once made to supply gratuitously food to persons rendered destitute; but very few applicants have presented themselves. The flood is subsiding. The water in the river being now lower than that behind the bank, the latter has been cut lower down stream in order to let the accumulated water escape. There is no suspicion of the accident having been occasioned by any malicious person. The Commissioner has been instructed, as soon as he has ascertained all further facts, to report them in detail.

TRADE MARKS ACT—REGISTRATION OF "FANCY WORDS."

Mr. LOCKWOOD (York) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of three Judges having respectively decided that words divorced from their dictionary meaning become "fancy" words, entitled to be registered under "The Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883" (46 and 47 Vic. c. 57), he will give to the Comptroller and other officials at the Patent Office instructions that the above-mentioned decisions be duly carried out?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Having regard to the desirability of obtaining an authoritative decision on the subject of the registration of dictionary words as trade marks, the Board of Trade have determined to present an appeal in the case recently decided. Meanwhile, the Comptroller will not refuse to register any word which has no connection with locality and cannot possibly be a word of description.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE DRAINAGE OF THE BANN.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Ulster Canal question, in connection with the drainage of the Bann, will be referred to the proposed Royal Commission?

Sir John Gertel

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I can only state generally that the References to the Commission on this head will, of course, be of a general character, and that it will be for the Commissioners to decide whether there is such a connection between the Ulster Canal and the drainage of the Bann as to necessitate that it should form part of the inquiry.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the Commissioners would have it within their discretion to extend the Reference made to them?

ARMY—"APPREHENDED DISTURBANCES IN ENGLAND."

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraphs, which appeared in The Times newspaper of Monday, 23rd August, page 7:—

"Apprehended Disturbances in England.—Sir Evelyn Wood, the General Commanding the Eastern District, pursuant to instructions from the War Office, has issued orders to the Volunteers in his District to assemble for picket duty, and to hold themselves in readiness to assist in quelling rioting and disturbance. The order will probably continue in force throughout the ensuing autumn and winter.

"The contingent selected from the Chelmsford Corps consists of one officer, one serjeant, two corporals, and twenty privates. Twenty rounds of ball cartridge have been served out to each man. Their duties are to parade twice a week near the Shire Hall, and to be prepared at any moment to turn out and assist the police if necessary. The picket will be changed once a month; but the present picket will remain on duty till the end of September.

"It is understood that the order has been issued in preparation of apprehended dynamite outrages and Irish disturbances in the Northern and Midland towns."

and, whether there is any foundation for the statements contained in the paragraphs?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he was happy to inform the hon. Gentleman that there was no apprehension of a disturbance in England or in the Eastern district; that the General Commanding in that district had not issued any instruction of the kind referred to; and that probably the paragraph in The Times originated in the fact that in February last the attention of commanding officers had been drawn to No. 447 of the Volunteer Regulations, which imposed upon Volunteer officers the necessity of taking adequate precautions for the safety of arms intrusted to their care.

STATE OF IRELAND—CONSTABULARY FORCE AT MILLSTREET, CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why so large a force of Constabulary is kept stationed at or about Millstreet; and, whether the district is extremely peaceful?

An hon. MEMBER asked whether the neighbourhood of Millstreet had become more peaceful since the day on which speeches were delivered there by the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner); and whether the right hon. Baronet would lay on the Table of the House the reports of the speeches which were made in the presence of the police, and forwarded by them to the authorities in Dublin?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I believe the district of Millstreet has become more peaceable since the time alluded to by the hon. Member behind me; but I am not prepared to give any undertaking about the reports, because I have not heard of them until to-day. With regard to the Question put to me by the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Tanner), I have to say that there are 25 policemen at Millstreet, and their presence is necessary in order to afford protection to persons whose lives and property have, it is feared, been placed in danger by inflammatory speeches made in the neighbourhood, and other causes. There is a good deal of "Boycotting" and intimidation in the district, though actual outrage is kept in check by the presence of the police.

DR. TANNER: I should like to ask the right hon. Baronet by whom these speeches were made? And as the hon. Gentleman opposite has made a personal accusation against me for a speech I am said to have made at Millstreet, I desire to tell the hon. Gentleman that I shall be only too happy to let him have a copy of the speech this afternoon.

VOL. CCCVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

NAVY—DISCHARGE OF SHIPWRIGHTS AT HAULBOWLINE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What was the reason of the discharge of the shipwrights recently employed at Haulbowline; and, whether, bearing in mind the great depression of the times, the Government will advocate the re-employment of the men discharged, and the pressing forward of the works to completion?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) (Sheffield, Ecclesall) (who replied) said: The hon. Member renews the Question he addressed to me on Tuesday. I can only repeat that the works will be completed in 1888, and that no other course is open to the authorities but to discharge the men gradually as no longer required.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS, 1883 AND 1885—SCHEME FOR COTTAGES IN MACROOM UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Why, and for what reasons, the labourers' cottages which have been passed in the district of the Macroom Union are not being proceeded with?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): There has been no delay on the part of the Local Government Board in this matter. After necessary preliminaries the Guardians' petition for confirmation of their scheme was received by the Board on the 12th of June. The sanitary officer had omitted to send with it several indispensable documents. After these had been obtained from him, the usual inquiry, after public notice, was ordered to be held on the 27th and 28th of last month, and the result will be communicated to the Guardians at their next meeting.

EMIGRATION—THE EMIGRANTS INFORMATION BUREAU.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the arrangements for the establishment of the Emigration Information Office have been completed; and, if so, when the office is likely to be opened?

The arrangements for the establishment of an Emigrants' Information Bureau are very nearly completed, and we hope to open the office during the month of October. My hon. Friend is, no doubt, aware that it is not intended that the Bureau should take any part in promoting emigration; but it will collect and circulate all the freshest and most accurate information possible with respect to emigration to all our Colonies.

BURMAH—THE MILITARY EXPEDITION—THE COST.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What is the total cost incurred in connection with the Military operations in Upper Burmah since the order for the Military expedition on the 11th of November last; and, what is the present rate at which cost is being incurred in these operations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): According to the Revised Estimates for 1885-6 the cost of military operations in Burmah up to March 31, 1886, was 39 lakhs. The account of the actual expenditure has not yet been received. According to the Budget Estimate the cost of military operations for the current year is estimated at 30 lakhs. The Government have recently been informed by telegraph that this estimate will be exceeded, and are awaiting further information as to the amount.

INDIA—MIGRATION OF THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS TO HILL STATIONS.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that of late years the provincial Governments of Lower Bengal, the Punjaub, the North Western Provinces, Madras, and Bombay, have followed the example of the Supreme Government of India by removing every summer to a hill-station; and, if so, how many persons, including members of council, secretaries, clerks, and other subordinates, accompany each Government in its migration; and, what is the cost of these migrations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Provincial Governments of Lower Bengal, the Punjaub, the North-Western

Provinces, Madras, and Bombay, are accustomed to move to hill stations during the summer weather. There is no detailed information at the India Office as to the number of persons who accompany each Government in its migration, nor as to the cost; but the Secretary of State is now making inquiries from the Government of India upon the subject.

IRELAND—DISTRESS IN THE WEST—MR. TUKE'S REPORT.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House and print Mr. Tuke's Report on the Relief of Distress in the West of Ireland, undertaken by him at the request of the Government?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): Personally, I see no objection whatever to the Report referred to being presented, if the hon. Member wishes to move for it; but I feel some doubt to what extent I would be justified in regarding it as an official document at my disposal. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) stated in this House on the 8th of March, Mr. Tuke undertook, at his request, a work of benevolence in the West of Ireland in connection with seed supply, and he afterwards communicated to the right hon. Gentleman a Report on his labours. I think, therefore, it is rather for the right hon. Gentleman than for me to answer this Question?

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said, he thought it would be greatly to the advantage of the Public Service that the Report should be printed.

ASIATIC RUSSIA—THE FREE PORT OF BATOUM.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will take any further steps, in concert with other Powers, regarding the recent infraction of Treaties relating to the free port of Batoum, as shown in Lord Rosebery's Despatch?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Man-

BULGARIA -- REPORTED ABDICATION OF PRINCE ALEXANDER

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE Worcester, Evesham, asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are able to afford information to this House regarding the origin and cause of recent events in Bulgaria, and regarding the development of those events as affecting the international position of the Bulgarian State?

DR TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What further reports have been received from Her Majesty's accredited agents in Bulgaria, Servia, and Turkey, about the revolution alleged to have taken place on Saturday last, the 21st instant, which is stated to have resulted in the abdication of Prince Alexander; whether it is a fact that Russia, one of the Great Powers, has been an accessory in promoting the success of the popular undertaking in Bulgaria; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government purpose taking to vindicate British interests in the two recent infringements of the Treaty of Berlin by Russia, in Batoum and Bulgaria?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) Manchester, N.E.: In answering the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), I hope my hon. Friend the Member for South Worcestershire (Sir Richard Temple, will allow me to reply, at the same time, to his Questions on the same subjects. I have already stated to the House the occurrences of the 22nd of August—namely, the seizing of the Prince and his removal from the capital. It is now known that the act was committed by a small body of military officers with a detachment of soldiers. It was not till the evening that, after repeated attempts, a Provisional Government was formed. The Prime Minister, M. Karaveloff, firmly refused to take part in the movement. No communications of what passed could reach this country till Tuesday. It now appears that, on the regiments in the Provinces threatening to march on Sofia, the revolt, which Mr. Stephen, Her Majesty's Acting Agent and Consul General, calls "military," failed. The Provisional Government on Tuesday resigned; the military leader made submission to M. Karaveloff, who has resumed office, to save the honour of the country and preserve order, with full powers. On Monday loyal troops entered Sofia, the guard at the Palace was replaced, and the military conspirators were placed under arrest. News of public rejoicing was received from many quarters, especially from Philippopolis, where the Consul General had reported on the 25th that the President of the National Assembly had published a general appeal to the loyalty of the nation, and universal enthusiasm prevailed. The Representatives of the Powers at Sofia met on Tuesday and approved of the resumption of office by M. Karaveloff to preserve order. It is now known that Prince Alexander was placed on board of his own yacht in the Danube, and taken to Reni Russi in Bessarabia. We are informed by the Acting Consul General at Galatz that the Prince landed yesterday at 10 A.M., being given by the Russian authorities perfect liberty to proceed by such route as he preferred. The hon. Member for Mid Cork asks Questions which are based on the most inaccurate recital of the facts. The "undertaking" in Bulgaria has not, so far, been "successful;" it was not "popular;" and I do not know on what grounds he alleges against any Power an infringement of the Treaty of Berlin in connection with these events. My hon. Friend the Member for South Worcestershire will, I am sure, see that inasmuch as the events which I have described, as far as they are authentically known, were altogether in the nature of a surprise, I can give the House no satisfactory account of their origin and cause—and still less of their probable development. The quotation from The Times newspaper made by the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) appears to be a comment upon reports which had reached the writer. I do not think that the House will desire that I should express concurrence or otherwise in such comments or inferences. I have stated the facts as known to the Government. We have no knowledge of the report stated in the second Question. The third Question is one of anticipation of future events, and of the course of Her Majesty's Government in a hypothetical case, which I cannot undertake to answer.

NORTH WALES—COLLECTION OF TITHES.

Mr. DILLWYN (Swansea Town) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the recent resistance to the collection of tithes in the parish of Llanarmon yn Yale, in North Wales; and, if so, whether he has reason to believe that such resistance was of an organised nature, and is likely to extend to other parishes?

Mr. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) also asked the Home Secretary, Whether his attention had been called to a letter printed in The Baur Cymru of August 21, signed J. Jones, in the course of which the following extract occurred:—

(Translation).—"It is likely that the sale will take place some day next week. If so, we are inviting all the farmers in the country here that day. It will be a great day to remember. Preparation day for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Wales will that day be;"

and, whether that constituted a resistance to the law of an organized nature as described by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn)?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this matter, and I am informed by the Chief Constable of the county of Denbigh that the resistance to the collection of tithes in the parish of Llanarmon is of an organized nature; but that it is impossible for him to say at present whether it is likely to extend to other parishes. In answer to my hon. Friend I have to say that my attention has been recently called to a letter signed by John Jones, one of the farmers distrained upon; and as far as I can gather from the learned language in which it is veiled—the Welsh—it does indicate an organized resistance to the payment of tithe.

Mr. SEXTON (Sligo, S., and Belfast, W.) asked whether it was the intention of the Government to send a military officer to take command in Wales?

BOARD OF TRADE—THE LABOUR BUREAU—APPOINTMENT OF MR. BURNETT.

Mr. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether Mr. Burnett has been appointed to an official position in the Board of Trade, in connection with the Labour Bureau; whether he will state the nature of that appointment, with the qualification and salary attached to it; whether Mr. Burnett is the Secretary of the Society of Amalgamated Engineers; whether he is taking part at this moment in the International Trades Union Congress at Paris, of which he has been elected President; and, whether such post has been accepted with the knowledge and consent of the Board of Trade?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Mr. Burnett has been appointed to an official position as stated, and at a salary of £300 a-year. He is to assist in the collection and preparation of labour statistics, and in obtaining information as to the employment of labour. He is at present Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, but will resign that appointment when he takes up his duties at the Board of Trade on the 4th October. He is understood to be at present taking part in the International Trades Union Congress in Paris; but it appears to the Board of Trade that there is no reason why he should not fulfil the engagements he has made previous to his assumption of his official duties.

Mr. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) asked whether it was not the fact that, at the meeting referred to in the last Question, Mr. Burnett had spoken against the Socialist views of the French and German Socialists, and deprecated the introduction of such matters at a Trade Union Congress?

Mr. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If he could lay before the House Papers explaining the scope and object of the new Labour Bureau, for the information of working men?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison), I believe that Mr. Burnett's words may bear the interpretation he puts upon them. I have received the private Notice of the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool. If he will move for a Return or explanatory Memorandum, I will endeavour to give him the best information in my power. Some details still require adjustment. I shall be glad if the hon. Member will confer with me as to the form of the Return.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): As I am responsible for the appointment of Mr. Burnett, perhaps the House will permit me to supplement the answer given by the hon. Gentleman. In consequence of a Resolution of this House, I undertook to form a Bureau of Labour and of Statistics, in March last, which was to inquire into the organization, remuneration, and expenditure of the working classes, and I undertook the organization of the new Department under the superintendence of Mr. Giffen, the Chief of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade. With regard to all questions relating to the organization and remuneration of labour, I know of no man in England so well-informed, or more thoroughly in touch and sympathy with the working classes, than Mr. Burnett. I appointed him without any solicitation on his part, or any of his friends. I have known Mr. Burnett for 18 years, and I regard him as one of the most remarkable men of his class in this country, and no man is more adapted to the post to which he has been appointed. I undertook to allow him to complete his engagements before he entered on his duties.

BURMAH—PUBLIC WORKS—RAILWAYS.

MR. DALRYMPLE (Ipwich) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If Her Majesty's Government have had their attention called to the urgency of prosecuting public works in Burmah; if there is any prospect of the railway near Mandalay, which has already been surveyed, being begun; and, whether an offer has been laid before the Secretary of State and the Government of India for the construction of the railway, the prosecution of which would greatly assist the administration of Burmah?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GOSWOLD, Chatham): The attention of Her Majesty's Government has been for some time directed to the urgency of prosecuting public works in Burmah, and they have addressed communications to the Government of India on the subject. Of the railway from Rangoon to Mandalay—a distance of 416 miles—166 miles are completed, and 62 are under survey. Several offers for the construction of this railway have been submitted to the Secretary of State; but until an answer is received from the Government of India no decision can be arrived at.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked whether it was not the case that the Government of India was waiting for the decision of the Secretary of State, and that while each waited for the other nothing was done?

SIR JOHN GOSWOLD said, he did not believe that that was the fact; but if his hon. Friend gave Notice of the Question he would inquire and ascertain.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Universities (Scotland) Bill early next Session?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Yes, Sir; I do hope to introduce such a Bill next Session.

PARLIAMENT — PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the seven recommendations of the Select Committee on the Ventilation of the Houses of Parliament, contained in the Second Report of the 31st of May last, are all or some of them, and, if so, which of them is being carried out; and, whether there is a prospect of the works involved in them being completed by the time Parliament re-assembles in February?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The Committee on the Ventilation of the House has been re-appointed, and has held its first meeting to-day. I am authorized to state that the Committee is satisfied that its recommendations are now being carried out with as little delay as possible, and I hope that the necessary works will be in the main completed before Parliament re-assembles next year.

MANUFACTURE OF NORDENFELT GUNS AT WOOLWICH.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as stated in The Admiralty and Horse Guards Gazette, that Nordenfelt rapid-firing shell-guns have been manufactured in the Royal Gun Factory at Woolwich for the inventor and patentee of those guns, the late Government charging the said inventor the sum of £150 per gun so manufactured and delivered to him in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich; whether the Government subsequently repurchased from the patentee at £360 per gun these same guns which had cost him only £150 per gun; and, whether these guns were tried, proved, and accepted by the same authorities who manufactured them, and whether it has since been discovered that the cost of manufacture of the said guns to the late Government exceeded the cost charged to Mr. Nordenfelt; and, if so, by how much?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOKE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The facts are not accurately stated by this paper. The quick-firing guns were not made at Woolwich. The circumstances were as follows:—A contract was entered into with Mr. Nordenfelt for a certain number of these guns with fittings and mountings complete, and, to facilitate supply, it was arranged that the barrels only should be made for him in the Royal Gun Factory. He was charged at the rate of £131 19s. 5d. and a fraction per barrel, being the cost of production, plus 10 per cent; and, therefore, the price originally tendered by Mr. Nordenfelt—namely, £376 per gun and mounting complete—was lessened by this amount. The guns and fittings were, like all guns for Her Majesty's Service, by whomsoever made, tried, proved, and accepted by the authorities of the Royal Gun Factories. As appears from the above, this cost of the barrels to the Government did not exceed that charged to Mr. Nordenfelt.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—WEXFORD COUNTY.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the eviction of sixty-two persons, being the wives and children of thirteen small farmers on the estates of the Marquess of Ely in Wexford County; whether it is true that these people have been driven from their holdings into the workhouse, simply because they were unable, through bad seasons and fall of prices, to pay the rent demanded by the landlord; whether it is true that large numbers of farmers have been served with processes of ejectment under similar circumstances in Wexford County; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps to interfere in some way to prevent evictions during the coming winter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BAUGH) (Bristol, W.): The persons referred to, who were 49 in number, were not the occupiers of agricultural holdings, as the hon. Member appears to suppose. They were the tenants merely of small houses, held at rents which, I am informed, were not excessive. They obtained other houses in the town of Fethard; but were compelled by the influence of the local branch of the National League to leave them and go to the workhouse. I believe it is the case that writs have been served on a number of farmers in the county of Wexford. We cannot prevent evictions; it is our duty to protect the officers of the law in its execution. I have already deprecated harsh action on the part of landlords.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, it was absolutely untrue that these people—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I beg to give Notice that I shall ask the right hon. Gentleman—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give Notice of his Question to the Clerk at the Table in the usual way.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Perhaps the House will allow me to ask the Chief Secretary one Question, which I am sure he can answer now. It is, whether it is not the fact that the local branch of the National League have nothing whatever to do with the tenure of houses in towns; and whether the action which the right hon. Gentleman has referred to has not actually been taken by a House League, and not by the National League?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: If I have done injustice to the National League by mistaking its action for that of a House League I should be very sorry; but the action of a House League is at least equally objectionable.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE RIOTS AT BELFAST.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that the congregation of the Albert Street Presbyterian Church, Belfast, on the recommencement of public service in their church on Sunday last were attacked by a Roman Catholic mob, and their pastor, the Rev. Henry Montgomery, insulted; and, whether the freedom of public worship in Belfast will be vindicated by the Government?

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S., and Belfast, W.): As the Member representing the Division of Belfast which is concerned in this Question, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the earliest stage of any alleged disagreeable incidents in connection with this church came later to a series of attacks on the lives and property of Catholics and Catholic churches and schools in the same quarter of Belfast; and also, whether he is aware that on Tuesday last the Executive Committee of the Magistrates of Belfast held a meeting on the subject, having before them a letter from the Rev. Mr. Montgomery, and the Reports which had been made by the Resident Magistrates and other officers who were charged with the preservation of the peace of the district on the day in question, and whether he is aware that they unanimously agreed that the statements were in most cases exaggerated and in many cases altogether unfounded, and that having regard to the present excited state of the town the Committee of Magistrates were of opinion that any annoyance which individual members of the congregation suffered in going to or coming from the church were not of a serious character; and whether, under these circumstances, the freedom of public worship in Belfast needs any vindication from Her Majesty's Government?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I am afraid it is impossible for me to answer the Question of the hon. Member, of which I have had no Notice. I asked the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast to postpone his Question the other day, because I observed that the reports published in the newspapers with regard to the occurrence were of a character which certainly was at variance with the reports I have received. The alleged occurrences have been closely inquired into by the Executive Committee of the Magistrates of Belfast, and I am happy to be able to inform the hon. Member that they were found to be greatly exaggerated. The Rev. Mr. Montgomery himself was good enough to meet the Magistrates, and he expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with the arrangements which had been made for protection and the manner in which the duty was performed, and he thanked the Inspector General for what had been done. He subsequently wrote to the Committee of Magistrates, stating that, while the Executive had done all that could possibly be expected for the protection of the congregation, yet in some cases individual members of the congregation had been insulted and some few assaulted, though not seriously, and he thought that the Constabulary had not been sufficiently energetic. This matter was specially considered by the Committee of Magistrates convened for the purpose, and the result was that they were satisfied that due precautions had been taken. I may add that the Committee of Magistrates consisted of persons representing the different phases of opinion in Belfast.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—
AT DIVINE SERVICE.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether, as is done in Scotland by the Commissioners of Northern Lights, provision will be made for the attendance at Divine Service on Sundays of light-house-keepers on isolated rocks off the Irish Coast; and also for the education of their children, by increasing the number of relieving stations, or otherwise providing for the instruction of numbers of boys and girls growing up without elementary education?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I regret that I am unable at present to reply to the hon

Member's Question in the absence of the detailed information from the Light-house Authorities, which is again being pressed for.

POST OFFICE—FEMALE CLERKS.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the female clerks employed in the Clearing House Branch of the Office of the Receiver and Accountant General of the Post Office are frequently kept at work till seven p.m. and later, both on week-days and on the Saturday half-holidays, although their official hours are from ten till four on week-days, and from ten till one on Saturdays; whether it is true that, although this overtime work is nominally optional, the female clerks are not allowed to leave at their regular hours, and are led to believe that any refusal to do this extra work will be detrimental to their chances of promotion; whether it is true that, since October last, several female clerks in the Clearing House Branch have applied for sick leave; and, whether, if these things are the case, he will take steps to prevent the overworking of the women in question?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that, owing to the rapid increase in the number of telegrams, the work of the Clearing House Branch has been greatly augmented, and a considerable amount of overtime work is unavoidably imposed upon the staff until the arrangements for affording relief can be completed. The subject is one of considerable difficulty, as, although the employment of 82 extra clerks has been authorized since the reduction of the telegraph rate, the accommodation only admits of the employment of 62; and steps are being taken as speedily as possible to obtain new premises. I find that out of a staff of over 150 the number detained on extra duty up to 7 p.m. last week averaged four per day for the first four days; but 43 stopped on duty on Friday in order not to interfere with the Saturday half-holiday. The additional clerks already appointed are daily becoming more efficient, and are reducing the overtime work. Every effort is being made, by rotation of duty, to make the work as light as possible to individuals. It would be impossible to exempt the female staff from the obligation to perform extra duty in times of emergency altogether without striking a very serious blow at the employment of female labour in the Post Office. The Returns of sick absences in this branch do not show any exceptional increase since October; and although there are two or three cases of prolonged absence these cannot well be attributed to pressure of business consequent on the reduced rate, as the absences date from a time preceding the pressure.

LOCOMOTIVES ACT, 1878—BYE-LAWS OF ROAD TRUSTEES.

MR. MENZIES (Perthshire, E.) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether his attention has been called to the recent prosecution of Messrs. Crichton, Burrelton, Perthshire, for contravention of a by-law regarding locomotives which had been approved by the Home Secretary in 1880, whereby Messrs. Crichton had been fined for using waggons in Forfarshire, which it is legal and unobjectionable to use in Perthshire; if he will consider the question whether the power to pass a by-law for merely regulating the use of locomotives on roads includes the power to affect the construction of locomotives and waggons, which is carefully and minutely specified in a separate section of "The Locomotives Act, 1878," as regards locomotives, and in various Statutes as regards waggons; and, whether he will in future endeavour to aim at introducing greater uniformity into the bye-laws made by road trustees when granting or withholding his approval to such bye-laws?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he was aware of the inconvenience that arose on account of the divergence of the bye-laws in different counties. Whether that inconvenience should be remedied by special legislation, or in a Local Government Bill for Scotland, was a question for consideration.

ADMIRALTY—ENGINE ROOM ARTIFICERS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will specify what consideration the Royal Naval Engine Room Artificers have received from the Board of Admiralty; and, whether any, and what steps have been taken to improve their position since their case was mentioned and supported by two Members of the present Government in the Debate on the Navy Estimates on the 18th of March last?

THE FIRST LORD LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I stated the other day that the position and comfort of the engine room artificers will receive every consideration from the Admiralty, and to that statement I have nothing to add. Since the 18th of March the Admiralty have been in communication with the Treasury in reference to a proposed increase of these chief petty officers; but, with this exception, nothing else has been done to improve their position. The engine room artificers are a valuable body of men, and have done good service; but, so far from there being any difficulty in obtaining them at present, good candidates for entry have to be turned away as the list is full.

MAURITIUS—OFFICIAL DISSENSIONS.

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps he proposes to take in consequence of the unfortunate state of affairs in the Mauritius?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My hon. Friend may well describe the state of affairs in the Mauritius as unfortunate. It has had my very careful attention, and, having read the complaint of Sir John Pope Hennessy against the Lieutenant Governor, and of Mr. Clifford Lloyd against the Governor, I have come to the conclusion that the situation is one most prejudicial to the interests of good government in the Colony. In these circumstances, I have already addressed a despatch to Sir John Pope Hennessy, stating that the relations between himself and his principal officer are regarded by Her Majesty's Government with grave dissatisfaction, and that the responsibility for this state of affairs rests, not with one only, but with both of them. I added that the good government of the Colony and the restoration of friendly relations would be promoted by the immediate separation of the two officials, and I directed Mr. Clifford Lloyd to proceed at once to the Seychelles, to take up the duties of Chief Civil Commissioner. What further steps, if any, it may be necessary to take in the interests of the people of the Mauritius I am not yet able to inform my hon. Friend, as I wish to reserve any final opinion until we are sure that we have before us all the facts necessary to a just decision.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) asked whether it was not the fact that Sir John Pope Hennessy was not consulted before the appointment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and whether the traditions of the Service had not thereby been disregarded?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that such a thing happened occasionally in the Service, although he was not sure whether it was the case in the present instance or not.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The gentleman who was then Colonel Stanley made the appointment.

BURMAH—THE MILITARY EXPEDITION—APPOINTMENT OF COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What has been the result of the communications stated by the Under Secretary on the 25th March last to be in progress between the Viceroy and the Secretary of State in Council, with a view to putting all the forces in Upper and Lower Burma under the Commander in Chief; and, whether the troops in Upper and Lower Burma are still under separate commands?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GOSW) (Chatham): The troops in Upper and Lower Burmah are still, as a temporary measure, retained under separate Commanders. As soon as the cool weather commences, when the troops in Burmah will be largely reinforced, Sir Herbert Macpherson, the Commander in Madras, will proceed to Burmah and take the personal command of the whole of the forces in both Upper and Lower Burmah.

ENGLAND AND CHINA—TREATY REGARDING BURMAH.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will state to the House the terms of the treaty or agreement concluded with China on the subject of the rights of suzerainty, tribute, &c., claimed by that Power over Burma; and, whether Papers will be laid upon the Table in connection with these negotiations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The substance of the Agreement respecting Burmah signed at Peking on the 24th ultimo is as follows:—Her Majesty's Government agreed that the highest authority in Burmah should continue the customary ten-yearly Missions. China agreed that in all matters whatsoever appertaining to the authority and rule which England is now exercising in Burmah, England should be free to do whatever she deems fit and proper. China agreed to protect and encourage trade between China and Burmah, the frontier to be marked by a Delimitation Commission, and the conditions of the frontier trade to be settled by a Frontier Trade Commission. Her Majesty's Government consented to countermand the proposed Mission to Thibet, and the Chinese Government undertook to take steps to promote and stimulate trade between India and Burmah. A copy of the Agreement will be presented to Parliament as soon as it is received from Peking in a formal shape.

LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND)—BYE-LAWS AS TO BICYCLES AND TRICYCLES.

MR. MENZIES (Perthshire, E.) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether he is aware that there is now a great want of uniformity in the by-laws of the different counties of Scotland applicable to bicycles and tricycles; and, whether he will introduce a Bill making the Secretary for Scotland the approving authority in the case of those by-laws instead of the sheriff of each county, or undertake to deal with the matter in some measure of a cognate nature?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The answer which I gave to the hon. Gentleman's previous Question applies to this one.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I wish to be allowed to supplement an answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Portsmouth on Tuesday last, with reference to the allegation that certain officers who have been engaged in the Ordnance Department have held shares in public Companies concerned in the manufacture of guns. I wish to read the following letter which I have received from Sir Frederick Campbell:—

“August 25.

“Sir,—With reference to the Question asked in the House of Commons yesterday as to my holding shares in the Sir William Armstrong and Mitchell Company, during the period I held the appointment of Director of Artillery and Stores, I beg to assure you I held no shares in the Company named while I held that appointment. I left the War Office in February, 1883; in April, 1883, I purchased 15 shares in the Sir William Armstrong and Mitchell Company, but sold them in October, 1883; and it was only during that period, and while unemployed, that I had any connection with the Company.—Your obedient servant,

“F. A. CAMPBELL, General.”

The practice at the Ordnance Department is to require every officer connected with it to cease any connection with any firm likely to become War Office contractors. This rule includes officers in any capacity whose duties call upon them to arrange contracts, or to engage in any matter which may involve personal considerations.

IRELAND (SOUTH-WEST DISTRICT)—SIR REDVERS BULLER.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What will be the relation of General Sir Redvers Buller to the General commanding Her Majesty's Forces in Ireland; whether General Buller will have authority to direct and control the movements of the Military in his district without the intervention of the Commander in Chief; and, whether he will have powers to try and sentence persons charged as well as to pursue offenders?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I think the hon. Member is under some misapprehension as to the nature of Sir Redvers Buller's appointment. Sir Redvers Buller will hold a civil appointment in the counties of Kerry and Clare. As holder of that appointment, it will be his duty to superintend any general operations whenever the military may be called in to assist the civil power, and it will be his duty to regulate such operations. But he will not hold a military appointment at all, and he does not go to Kerry to establish martial law, as some hon. Members have suggested, nor even to strain the civil law. He is to act under the powers of the law, with a view to the organization of the arrangements for the restoration of order, and the detection and punishment of crime in Kerry and Clare. Sir Redvers Buller, like other persons holding the appointment of Divisional Magistrate under the Crown, will not act judicially in Petty Sessions.

NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—RULE 2 (ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE).

Mr. E. R. RUSSELL, Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., the Appointment of a Military Officer over an extensive district in Ireland, with undefined administrative and magisterial powers; but, the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and, not less than 40 Members having risen accordingly:—

Mr. E. R. RUSSELL: I can assure the House I am very reluctant to interfere with the course of Business. I should not have done so, if I could have reconciled it with my sense of duty to acquiesce in an appointment which seems to me to be contrary to Constitutional principles, adverse to the future interests and peace of Ireland, and likely to introduce bad precedents into our own Government. I should have been glad if the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) to the question I have just put would have enabled me to abstain from making this Motion; but I must say that, having regard to the great position of Sir Redvers Buller—to his undoubted military position—to the fact that a military position is the only one in which he is known to the country, and also to the circumstance that it was not exactly in the tone and spirit of the right hon. Gentleman who has just answered my question that the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller, nor was it in that spirit that the appointment was spoken of in the House of Lords by the Chief of the Government—I feel bound to go on in the course I have determined to take in the matter. I feel also that it is very essential, considering what may be in store for us in the future, that Members should have an opportunity of formally protesting from the outset against a course which I am sure hereafter they will be very glad not to have gone into when it was proposed. I go on the simple principle that it is contrary to the genius and spirit of our institutions for military men to be called from their military duties to perform those of civil magistrates. I may have to contend, at the outset, with a feeling that the state of things in Kerry is so bad that it is scarcely becoming for anyone to interfere with any step that may be taken for mitigating the condition of that county. I yield to none in horror and detestation of what is going on in Kerry. It would argue a great lack of imagination, and also of heart, to hear of the circumstances in that county without such a feeling. The darkness, the sudden interruption in the night, the horrible association of violence and terrorism, the absolute confusion and cruelty of the whole business must strike us all with horror. But it is not the first time in the history of this country, or of other countries, that events and processes of this kind have been going on, and that it has yet been necessary to protest against the means by which the civil power endeavours to stop them. A very difficult and serious circumstance in this matter is that—as was stated the other night by a right hon. Gentleman who lately occupied a high Office in the Government of Ireland—there is every sign that the people of Kerry either sympathize with these proceedings, or are determined, as a matter of consulting their own interest, not to interfere with them. That produces embarrassments which we are bound to consider. But such things as these only exist in ill-governed countries. We cannot improve the government of a country by handing over its civil administration to military men. If the administration of the law in Kerry is not efficient, it is our duty, as far as we can, to make it so. Now, the noble Lord at the head of the Government in "another place" has admitted that the administration of the law and police in Kerry is unsatisfactory. The system, he said, had drifted into an unreasonable shape, and that was a matter which required careful overhauling and inquiry, and probably entire re-organization. These are facts notorious to both sides of the House; but I believe they will not be met in the same spirit on both sides. We may test the spirit of the Administration by the manner in which the Marquess of Salisbury addresses himself to this difficulty. If we found the Prime Minister thoroughly re-organizing the Civil Staff—if we found him bringing into play all the resources of the great Civil Service of this country, in order to produce a better state of things in Kerry—then he would deserve in any result our praise; and it is our principle, on the Liberal side of the House, that he would be adopting the course most likely to conduce in the end, along with those greater measures we advocate, to the results we all desire. Instead of that, the noble Marquess goes beyond civil life altogether, and chooses a soldier. What soldier does he choose? Why does he choose that soldier? He told us that he desired the attention of minds which had been engaged in the solution of similar problems in other parts of the globe. What are those problems that Sir Redvers Buller has solved in other parts of the globe? How did he solve them? The answer to these questions leads us very close to the conviction that the policy of the Government at the present moment, by the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller—which I take to be by far the most important announcement of policy which they have made—is to degrade Ireland at once to the level of a savage and a barbarous country. The Government, it is true, do not say that—they do not formulate it—but it is the spirit and the effect of their measure. They are acting upon it. I think it must have struck many people who have watched the Irish discussions of the last few months that there has been a remarkable contrast between that private conversation and much of the writing in the Press upon which in reality their policy is founded, and the spirit and the tone of speeches which are made in this House. Happily, the speeches made in this House, and the tone of our policy, is infinitely superior to what we hear at dinner tables and in clubs, and in mingling in general society. But this appointment of a military man to re-organize society in Ireland they announced to satisfy the unworthy feelings which prevail throughout a large part of the country against the Irish. And then, by the humane lips of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, they are enabled to say that the gallant General is taking up a purely civil position. I cannot bring my mind to believe that that is the case. I do not deny that the right hon. Gentleman professed—and I am sure with truth—that he would, under all circumstances, exercise any influence that he might have upon Sir Redvers Buller in a spirit of justice, humanity, and kindness. But that is not enough. The gallant General was chosen because he was a soldier, and he would not have been chosen—being a soldier—unless it had been thought there was work there fit for a soldier. I have no doubt the Government had fully persuaded themselves that Sir Redvers Buller had the qualities which exactly fitted him to undertake the task of restoring order in a thoroughly unruly and disturbed district. To do this was to adopt a principle contrary to our Constitution—flying in the face of all the principles of civil liberty in which we have been brought up. The statement of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he introduced this matter to the House, was scarcely consistent with the idea of the subordinate position in which Sir Redvers Buller is now attempted to be placed by the explanations of the Government. The importance of this officer, the rank he holds in the Army, forbids such a supposition. Of course, we all know perfectly well that it is a common thing for men who have developed in military command, or even service, qualities which the Army is well adapted to produce in men of good calibre and abilities—it is a common circumstance for them in the latter part of their life to undertake civil duties, and to perform those duties satisfactorily. But these men sacrifice their military positions—they sacrifice their military character—they become,

to all intents and purposes, civilians. They are under civil control. They do not expect to go back into the Profession. They part altogether with both the prospects and the associations of military life. The consequence is that they are not liable to the dangers and temptations by which Sir Redvers Buller will be beset. If the Chief Secretary for Ireland would whittle this matter down so that Sir Redvers Buller would be accepting this office just as a half-pay officer takes the Governorship of a workhouse, or the Governorship of a gaol, then he would meet our views. But we know that would not have met the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Marquess of Salisbury, and would not have met the views of Sir Redvers Buller. I think there have been times when a soldier would have thought this an undesirable function. I do not, however, pronounce on that. I hold that a good policeman is quite as respectable as a good soldier. The only thing is that a good soldier does not always make a good policeman; and the Constitution of the country has always assumed that no one in the position of a soldier should have to perform the duties of a policeman. Another question for us to consider is, what security will there be against great infringements of liberty when this new rule of Sir Redvers Buller begins? It is a great innovation. A precedent is being set. But we have a very bad example—not exactly of the same kind—which leads us to expect evil results. What occurred when Mr. Clifford Lloyd was employed in Ireland? Mr. Clifford Lloyd was a civil officer, and he was under a Coercion Law, but not under the Crimes Act. It seems to be pretty notorious that he resorted to very extraordinary excess of licence, and took great liberties with the rights of the people. It was said that he gathered together, on various pretexts, young men in rooms in a village, and that he then examined them on matters which were likely to get them into trouble in connection with a revolt against the Government of Ireland. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had not the slightest warrant for that. It was neither the regular law nor the extraordinary law at the time; but he was praised by a lamented statesman, and encouraged to adopt courses of that kind. If such things as those were done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? I, for one, in this matter, have learned the lesson of the Elections. I wish the institutions of England, Ireland, and Scotland in this matter to be similar; and if we are going to have Sir Redvers Buller and military magistrates, then I suppose we had better secure simultaneity. The noble Lord knows very well that if it were attempted in Lancashire, where I live, or in Lanarkshire, a great constituency in which I have the honour to represent, things would become so hot for the Government that the attempt would have immediately to be abandoned. The practice does not correspond with our institutions or our customs. It is contrary to the principles of liberty, to which we justly attach so much importance. A great soldier is a good servant; but he is a bad master, and we should be very careful not to put him in that position. I object very strongly to what I take to be an evasion of the Constitution in Belfast. I think no soldier should have a double commission. I think no soldier should be a Justice of the Peace, so that he should read the Riot Act over the people whom he is going to shoot. Why have we these old restrictions, if it is not for the preservation of liberty? Why are we to part with them at a month's notice when we have the admission of the Chief of the Government that the civil condition in Kerry is such that it ought immediately to be overhauled, and when Members, at any rate on this side, are deeply impressed with the fact that the whole business is the result of bad government and bad institutions? I have been asked what I think Sir Redvers Buller ought to do when he goes to Kerry. That has been asked me in a Dublin journal, which gives the following lively account of what Sir Redvers Buller will do.

"Sir Redvers Buller," it says, "will act against the 'Moonlighters' precisely as if they were rebels in arms against the Queen."

[Ministerial cheers.] Exactly; you cheer that. That is just an instance of the mess you will get into if you appoint military magistrates to exercise civil authority. What does this amount to? It simply amounts to suddenly and roughly, on an emergency, in a single county, setting up the doctrine of constructive treason. They find these marauders pursuing their nefarious practices, and then say they are to be treated as rebels against Her Majesty. I say nothing in their favour. They are persons against whom everyone on this side will gladly see the utmost penalties of the law enforced. But it is a bad beginning if hon. Gentlemen opposite are ready to cheer a wild statement of a wild newspaper correspondent, that Sir Redvers Buller, a General in Her Majesty's Army, is going to arrest "Moonlighters" and treat them as if they were rebels against Her Majesty. I was asked by the same authority whether I would have General Buller act in co-operation with the Land League? All I want to do to the Land League is to cashier it. I believe that good self-government in Ireland will cashier it. Our duty is to give Ireland self-government, which would put an end to all such outrages—to all such manners and customs—as the League is alleged to encourage. In the meantime, if we cannot do that at once, our duty is limited to making the civil system as perfect as we can make it with civil material. I venture to make an appeal to my right hon. Friends on the Front Opposition Benches. I know very well that, from their ex-official position, they must be in some embarrassment on such subjects; but the House heard, with great respect, the remarks made the other evening by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) upon this subject. Many cruel and injurious things were said about my right hon. Friend in that home of vulgar and un-Christian rancour—Belfast. But we who see him in the House know, and are deeply impressed with, the sensitiveness of mind with which he has addressed himself to all these problems. I am firmly persuaded my right hon. Friend will never be deficient in the courage and sternness which are necessary for the enforcement of order in Ireland. But anyone who heard him the other night must have felt that there was a heaviness in his heart as he contemplated the dreadful conditions of life in the county of Kerry, and brought himself face to face with the issue—should he tolerate the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller in order that a better state of things might be introduced? I appreciate that, and honour my right hon. Friend for it; but I certainly think that, considering my right hon. Friend himself prophesied that the efforts of Sir Redvers Buller would not succeed, because they were not adapted to the case—I think that, although he may not be able to vote for this Motion, he may, at least, give some expression to his opinion that it is most adverse to the interest of Ireland, and dangerous to the Constitution of the country, that this new military practice should be introduced. It will not succeed. If it does succeed it will cost us some of our most justly prized traditions of civil freedom. Therefore, I think my right hon. Friend and others on the Front Benches are entitled, if they please, to indicate an opinion which will support the rank and file of their Party, and also support five-sixths of the Representatives of Ireland in the wish they have that the Constitution should still be preserved. [Loud and derisive laughter from Ministerial Benches.] It may be a very laughable matter that the Representatives of five-sixths of a country should wish to preserve its Constitution; but I should prefer the meaning of those laughs to come articulately—that some hon. Gentleman should get up and put into terms, which will be reported tomorrow and which will be quoted at the next Election, any sentiment conflicting with that which I have expressed. This is a sensational proceeding. It will only gratify that baser sort of politicians who live upon the prejudices of the British nation against the Irish nation. What is worse, it will draw into the net of disaffection the whole of the county of Kerry and a very large portion of the rest of Ireland, without reference to the justice or propriety of Sir Redvers Buller's proceedings, simply on the ground that the enforcement of law in Ireland will be identified with the introduction of the military into a position in which they have no right to be. It is most essential, for the restoration of the moral sense of the people of Ireland, that the opinion of the House on this subject should be taken. An important part of the moral sense of any community is confidence in the law under which they lived; and the Government are going to degrade the law by placing its administration in the hands of a distinguished soldier. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes; I adhere to that, not because I take any adverse view of Sir Redvers Buller's character, but because it is the very essence of law that it is degraded the moment the military element is introduced. The late Chief Justice Cockburn, who took such an interest in the question of martial law that he expressly took upon himself, out of the regular course, to go down to the Old Bailey and charge the Grand Jury in the Jamaica case, said, on that important occasion, that there were dangers more grave and threatening than even the duration of an insurrection, and that the eternal and immutable principles of justice could never be violated without peril to the true interests and well-being of a civilized community. I do not mean to suggest that the Chief Secretary would wilfully invade those eternal and immutable principles of justice; but I do say that the Government are introducing an enormous innovation when they militarize the personnel of justice. When they tamper with the civil integrity of the magistracy they open a door to the influx of the greatest evils. If you suffer the redcoats to administer the law, they will undoubtedly caricature it; and law can neither be caricatured nor perverted without at once endangering the stability and the happiness of the people.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. E. R. Russell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. E. R. Russell) has made to the House a learned and, I must say, also an exhaustive speech. He holds strong opinions, and he has proposed to the House a certain course which it should adopt. In his opinion, the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller to Kerry is a startling innovation in our Constitution, a serious blow to civil and religious liberty, a wilful invasion of the immutable principles of justice, and other things of that serious kind. He holds these strong opinions, and he prophesies the most alarming results. He declares that the result will be that all Kerry will almost immediately take an active part in the proceedings of the "Moonlighters,"—[Mr. E. R. Russell: I did not say that.]—and that all Ireland will very shortly be involved in a general conflagration. Now, Sir, I do not complain of the hon. Member holding these opinions; they are opinions he is perfectly entitled to hold and to express. What I want the House to do is to compare the opinions he holds with the course he suggests. What is the course which the hon. Member proposes? He proposes that the House of Commons should immediately adjourn. What will be the effect of that course upon Sir Redvers Buller or his appointment? Absolutely nothing. The House would adjourn if they agreed with the hon. Member, and, like the Emperor Titus, might exclaim that they had lost a day; but before the House met again Sir Redvers Buller would be well on his way to Kerry. That is the course which the hon. Gentleman proposes, in all seriousness, that we should adopt. May I point out to the hon. Member, with all respect, what I think would have been the proper course for him to pursue if he sincerely holds, as I am sure he does, these very strong and alarming opinions? Obviously he ought to have made a Motion in the form of an Amendment to the Address; because what would have been the results of this course if he had been successful? He would have put an end instantly, or, practically, instantaneously, to the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller; and, what is much more, I imagine that by his proposition he would have put an end to the Government responsible for that appointment. That is what I imagine would have been a practical, rational, and sensible course to pursue. In replying to the hon. Member, I intend to make my remarks as brief and as few as possible; but I must diverge, for one moment, to notice one special observation which fell from him. The hon. Member stated that he had the strongest possible objection to the employment of military officers in civil positions, and that he had a special objection to this particular appointment of Sir Redvers Buller on account of his military experience, and, to some extent, civil experience, having been drawn from his treatment of savages, and his relations with savage tribes in various quarters of the world. That was the opinion of the hon. Member, and it is an opinion of which I do not complain for one moment; it is not an opinion which I should share myself altogether; but it is the opinion of a sensitive and highly-strung, nervous organization. What surprised me most was this—that this opinion of the hon. Member was received with great cheering and approval on the Front Opposition Bench. Would the House be surprised to learn that this principle which the hon. Member has laid down, and for which I might say there is much to be said in the abstract, was violated in the grossest manner, not six months ago, by a right hon. Gentleman who sits opposite (Mr. Childers)? The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends cheered the hon. Member in his denunciation of the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller, a military officer, to a civil post. Are they aware that the late Government appointed Sir Charles Warren, an officer on the active list, liable to be recalled at any moment to military service, not to look after "Moonlighters" in Kerry, but after what I hope are the civilized inhabitants of London, curiously enough for much the same reason?

MR. SEXTON (Sligo): Have you made him a magistrate?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Yes; he has magisterial power. Mark the analogy. The present Government are of opinion that there has possibly been some failure, some want of energy in the police arrangements in Kerry, and they select Sir Redvers Buller to detect whether there is any defect, and, if there is, to apply a remedy. That was precisely the reason why a distinguished officer, whose military experience has been gained in dealing with savage tribes, was selected by the late Government to superintend the police of the Metropolis. Therefore, when the hon. Member who made this Motion appealed to his own Leaders to support him on this Motion, he can hardly have been aware that by their conduct six months ago they are absolutely precluded from giving him the smallest support. But what I have to remark upon is this. This matter has been before the House for some days. I announced to the House the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller last Thursday. Nobody has censured the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller until now. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I have not gathered from the hon. Member for Cork or any of his Friends that they considered the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller a matter for distinct censure or charge—["Oh, oh!"]—however, I learn it now for the first time. Certainly, nobody on the Front Opposition Bench has made it a matter of distinct censure or charge. Comments have been made; but they have not been comments which would lead me to suppose that such strong opinions existed about the appointment as apparently do now. But now it seems the appointment must instantly be brought under the consideration of the House, although the Motion can lead to no practical result. Why is this Motion made? The hon. Member calls the appointment a sensational appointment. I venture to think this is rather a sensational Motion. There are rumours floating about the House—rumours which have reached me from various sources, rumours which I think, if they are baseless and unfounded, should be publicly and authentically contradicted—as to the reason why this Motion has been brought forward. I am told the Motion has been brought forward in order to interrupt the regular proceedings of the House of Commons, and with the special object of intervening between the House and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain). It is certainly a most remarkable thing that all these strong feelings as to the nature of this appointment should have bubbled and boiled in the breast of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite for a whole week, and should only have exploded just on the day when the right hon. Gentleman is about to address the House. All I can say is that, if it is true, it is the greatest possible compliment to the right hon. Gentleman; it shows that his opponents fear so greatly the damaging character of the remarks which he is to make that there is no expedient which they will not resort to in order to annoy and embarrass and inconvenience the House which is anxious to hear him. The House is in possession of the fact of the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller. The policy of that appointment, we hold, cannot be debated in this way, because there is no definite issue before the House, and none whatever can be come to. I have to announce that Her Majesty's Government will take no part whatever in the discussion. We utterly decline to discuss the merits of the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller now. If hon. Gentlemen opposite wish to raise the question of the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller, let it be raised in a regular form. It can be raised in a regular manner—namely, by an Amendment to the Address; but in proceedings which I can only characterize as utterly irrational, in proceedings which I believe are only calculated to occupy in a most unprofitable manner the time of the House, and in proceedings which cannot possibly lead to any practical result and any public advantage, I, on behalf of the Government, decline to have the smallest part or concern.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): The last announcement of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think, comes singularly from one who used to avail himself to an extent that we considered a great abuse of Motions for Adjournment, and who raised discussions upon every possible subject to the interruption of important Public Business. I have never myself taken part in these Motions for Adjournment. I objected when the Rule was originally made, and I objected in a recent Committee to that practice. I have never done what the whole of the Front Ministerial Bench has done more than once—risen to support a Motion for Adjournment upon the most trivial question. I remember perfectly well a Motion on some peculiar view entertained upon the Income Tax by an hon. Gentleman much respected in this House. It was stated to be a matter of urgent public importance that this question should be discussed to the interruption of the whole Business of the House of Commons; and every Gentleman who was then upon the Front Opposition Bench rose to support that Motion. Therefore, for the noble Lord to say he refuses on a Question of Adjournment to discuss the question brought forward is practically to fly in the face of the Rules of the House, and of the practice of hon. Gentlemen among whom he sits. There is another remark of the noble Lord to which I may advert. The noble Lord says that if this Motion for Adjournment were carried it would have no effect upon the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller. I venture to think it would have a very great effect, because I think it would probably adjourn the mission of Sir Redvers Buller. As to the substance of this matter, I think it is one upon which we ought to speak with very great caution and very great reserve. I only wish that that course had been adopted from the first by Her Majesty's Government. I think that if the language, the very moderate language, employed by the Chief Secretary to-night had been used in introducing this appointment to the House there would not have been that anxiety—I may say that reasonable anxiety—in the public mind which has been produced by this appointment. I have only a question or two to ask with reference to that explanation, in order to show that I should not be dissatisfied with it. The great mischief which has been done is due to the tone, the language, and the spirit in which this appointment was announced to both Houses of Parliament. It was because the noble Lord chose to make of it a flourish of military trumpets, because he endeavoured to produce upon the public mind an impression that there was going to be something like that, which I confess I heard with astonishment and regret cheered from the Conservative Benches, and that Sir Redvers Buller was going to deal with the people of Kerry as if they were rebels. [An hon. MEMBER: Moonlighters.] I do not care who. Of course, Her Majesty's Government repudiate any such doctrine as that with indignation if they are fit to be British Ministers. Why, if they were murderers, you cannot shoot them down without trial, of course, unless you have a law to that effect; but you have not yet proposed it. Well, what does it mean treating ignorant men like rebels in arms? It means shooting them down without trial. Of course, that is not what the Government mean. If they meant anything like it they would deserve to be dismissed from their places. They do not mean anything of the kind. They have said that they have sent Sir Redvers Buller, not as an officer of the Army to deal with rebels in arms. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has said exactly the opposite. He said Sir Redvers Buller is to be sent as a Civil Magistrate acting strictly according to the existing law. So far, of course, that is satisfactory. But how was it spoken of by the noble Lord in introducing it to the House on the first night of the meeting of Parliament? If he had told us that Sir Redvers Buller, who was a distinguished officer, was going to become a police magistrate that would have been different. I must refer, however, to the extraordinary, and—if I may say so without offence—the most shallow fallacy of the noble Lord in comparing this appointment with that of Sir Charles Warren, who has no military authority in London. He has no military capacity whatever; it is in abeyance. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: So it is here.] If he remains on the active list, which I do not know, he cannot give a single order to a single soldier, or if he did so he would not be fit for his office. Is that to be the position of Sir Redvers Buller? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Yes.] Can he give no orders to the military in Kerry? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Yes.] Ah, then your comparison fails. [Home Rule cheers.] It is, I repeat, a most wretched fallacy. I gather from the noble Lord's attitude that he agrees that Sir Redvers Buller is to have no military authority in Kerry.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would be in the same position as any other magistrate.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If that be so, what was the meaning of the cheers from the Conservatives on the other side of the House? I am sure that if that had been understood it would, very probably, have disposed of this Motion. Let us see what the language of the noble Lord was on the first night of the Session. It was very different. The noble Lord said—

"Her Majesty's Government have decided to appoint a special military officer . . . to the command of the disturbed districts, with such powers as we believe will enable him to organize arrangements for the restoration of order."

I do not think it unnatural for us to have supposed that those were to be extraordinary powers.

"And for the cessation of the reign of terror which there prevails. This general officer will be directly responsible to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary; and the officer whom Her Majesty's Government have selected, and who has consented to undertake the duty, is Sir Redvers Buller."

If instead of that the noble Lord had said that they were going to send Sir Redvers Buller as a magistrate to Kerry. I doubt whether it would have been received with so much enthusiasm, or created so much alarm on this side of the House. It is certainly of the spirit of our institutions in recent times that the distinction should be carefully preserved between the civil action of the Civil Magistrates and the action of the military officer when it was necessary that the military officer should be called in to support the civil power. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) the other night referred rather in a spirit of taunt to my action with reference to the disturbances in Skye. [SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No.] I am glad to hear that. What was done in that case? I took care that the military should be used as a secondary force, the police being put in the forefront. I warned the authorities in Scotland that the moment the police or magistrates were withdrawn, the military would be withdrawn also, so that there should be no possibility of the military acting as a separate authority. If you think a distinguished military officer will make you an excellent magistrate, I have not a word to say against that; but then I think it most desirable that while so acting you should disavow him from his military character. I want to know, in the first place, is Sir Redvers Buller, when he becomes a Civil Magistrate, to remain a Military Commandant in that district? Does he supersede all the other magistrates in the district? And, in the next place, what is to be his relation to the Inspector General of the Constabulary in Ireland, because on that depends very much what would be the effect of his appointment on the Irish Constabulary? I heard with satisfaction from the noble Lord the strong and sound language he spoke out in defence of the Irish Constabulary in Belfast. I think the attacks made upon them have been most mischievous and most dangerous. But in what we do we must be very careful not to shake the organization of the Irish Constabulary. Though military in character it is a civil force, and if you import into it a military command you will very seriously affect the character of the Irish Constabulary, and if you import a person into a district of Ireland independent of, and superior to, the Inspector General, you very seriously shake his authority. Therefore I think we ought to be told what will be the effect of the appointment, if it is to be independent of the Inspector General of the Constabulary. If the Constabulary in Kerry are to be subject to the authority of the Inspector

General, exactly as any other constabulary in Ireland, then I think the objections taken are very much removed. I think it was a great pity in a matter of this kind this was not carefully explained, so as to remove misapprehension and alarm either in England or in Ireland. I do not want to use any inflammatory language—there has been too much on the other side—but it is very natural that an appointment of this kind, announced in this way, should cause commotion and comment. It is the natural consequence of the language used, especially by Lord Salisbury, with reference to the Irish people. ["Oh, oh!"] You cry "Oh, oh!" Do you think it has been forgotten that Lord Salisbury compared Irish people to Hottentots? I think in these matters it is desirable that an appointment of this kind should have been cautiously, carefully, and prudently introduced. All I can say is, that if I am correct in the interpretation which I have placed on the explanations given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—that Sir Redvers Buller stands in no other position and authority than that of an ordinary Divisional Magistrate in that district—I do not feel called upon to object, and I should not be justified in objecting, to the course the Government have taken. They incur a great responsibility. They are responsible for the preservation of peace in Ireland, and they ought to take the course which they think best for that purpose. But the noble Lord has entered into some speculations as to the reason why this Motion has been brought forward. I happened to be in the country last night, and did not hear that the Motion was to be brought on until I read something in the newspapers this morning to that effect. The noble Lord has made a most singular suggestion, not very dignified, coming as it did from the Leader of the House, as to the object of this Motion. I quite feel that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) deserves all the compliments which the noble Lord has paid him. But really I think the noble Lord was laying on the flattery a little too thick when he resorted to such an explanation for a Motion of this character. The idea of a Motion of this kind being brought forward for any such purpose as that suggested seems to me so utterly preposterous as to be unworthy of notice. I do not see how the Motion is going to prevent my right hon. Friend from addressing the House, and therefore it is hardly worthy of the noble Lord to have used such an argument as that to us. I hope this debate will not be long continued, though I think the attitude which the Government have taken in the matter is one which is rather provoking. If the noble Lord had been wise enough to have followed the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and had given moderate explanations in this matter calculated to remove the anxiety felt, it would have been more in the interests of Public Business. I hope, however, in these circumstances, it will be considered that we will take rather the version of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary than the "flare up" of the noble Lord as to the real meaning of this action. That being so, I hope hon. Members will now give the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham an opportunity of addressing the House.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, that, in his opinion, the matter would well bear a little further examination. It seemed to him as if the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) attached very little importance to the discussion that had been raised, for he had intimated that the decision of the House upon it would be treated as waste paper. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) did not think, by using such language as that, the noble Lord was likely to commend himself to the House as a worthy occupant of the position of its Leader. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) most indignantly repudiated the suggestion of the noble Lord as to the reason why this Motion had been brought forward. He and the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Mr. E. R. Russell) were primarily responsible for the subject being brought under the notice of the House; and neither he nor his hon. Friend was desirous of shirking the responsibility of raising a question which went to the root of our civil and religious liberty. The reason why the question had been raised at that juncture was because they learnt from the Press that Sir Redvers Buller was to proceed on his Irish mission to-morrow. The question was, therefore, an urgent one. He thought that the thanks of the House were due to the Mover of the Motion for raising a discussion on so important a subject, and also for having afforded the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition an opportunity of explaining the relations between military and civil law in regard to this matter. The noble Lord had suggested that the Motion was brought forward to delay the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). But it had certainly no such object, though there were some who thought that right hon. Gentleman was not quite the important personage that the noble Lord seemed to consider him. The right hon. Gentleman had a very small handful of followers in that House, and his position in the country was ridiculously exaggerated. He could, however, assure the noble Lord and the Member for West Birmingham that there was no thought of the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman, or of the time at which he was likely to address the House, when it was arranged to bring forward this Motion. He wished most emphatically to express his objection to the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller. He wished, in the most emphatic terms, to express his detestation of the sort of crime and outrage which appeared still to prevail in the county of Kerry. And, further, he would repeat in that House what he had said on the platform, a regret that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) and some of his Friends should have occasionally used language which was not of a soothing character, and he thought that what they had said in times gone by would have been better left unsaid. But he was ready to make allowance for the position in which they were placed, and he acknowledged the moderation that had characterized the speeches of hon. Members below the Gangway since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made his offer. The matter with which they were dealing went to the root of our Constitutional liberties, and there were special reasons at the present moment why they should look further into it. The Secretary of State for War (Mr. W. H. Smith) said, in answer to a Question from him (Mr. J. E. Ellis), that he was happy to inform him that there was no likelihood of any disturbance in the Midland or Northern counties. He represented a Midland and Northern county, and knew the state of feeling there. He deprecated the fact that a paragraph should be put in The Times and other papers of such a provocative nature as that to which he had referred. It had also been stated in the Press that there had been a meeting upstairs of military Members of the House. He was sometimes surprised at the frequency with which, in replying from the Front Bench—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask the hon. Member to keep strictly to the Question of the appointment of a military officer in Ireland.

MR. J. E. ELLIS said, he bowed to the Speaker's ruling, and hoped that the House would understand that the offence was due to inexperience. They really were not at all surprised at the appointment of General Buller, which was the outcome of the policy which had the authority of the Prime Minister, who, when he sat below the Gangway of this House as Lord Robert Cecil, speaking on the subject of Ireland, said—

"You must teach the Irish people to fear the law before you will get them to obey it."

That was precisely where the point of divergence between hon. Members opposite and the Liberal Party came in. That was the law of fear, and the rule of fear. Speaking at the Mansion House, on the 11th of August, Lord Salisbury had said—

"It is our duty to restore in Ireland that social order, the loss of which is the only just cause of discontent which the people have."

[“Hear, hear.”] That, again, was a point where they took issue. They said the loss of social order was not the only just cause of discontent. The Prime Minister meant what he said, and generally said what he meant.

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry again to have to interrupt the hon. Gentleman; but he is not confining himself to the Question.

MR. J. E. ELLIS said, he humbly apologized. The points which required further elucidation were the precise relation which this military officer would have in the civil government; was he to be a military man, or a Divisional Magistrate? Was he to have power to call the military to his aid. There had been, for all time, the most extreme jealousy of the interference of the military with the civil power. One of the most vital parts of our Constitution was the absolute distinction it drew between the civil and military powers. The Army itself existed only by consent of the House of Commons given yearly, and only for a period of 12 months. Anyone who doubted, or did not fully appreciate, the extreme jealousy of military rule or operations known to our Constitution should read the great Charge of Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of the "Queen v. Nelson and Brand," arising out of the Jamaica riots of 1865. What they wanted to know was, whether General Buller was to be a general or a magistrate? They were sent to those Benches to perform a grave and Constitutional duty—to uphold the rights and privileges of their countrymen, as handed down by their forefathers. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his place, had told them that the Government would not condescend to argue the matter. They were not disappointed at that announcement; as, probably, the explanation was because the Government could not find reasons for the course they proposed to pursue. The public would judge between the two parties. They had heard something of a final and irrevocable verdict of the country. One verdict, at all events, had been finally and irrevocably given—that was, that Ireland should and must be treated in a different manner to that in which she had been treated during the last century; and he did not think that in the appointment of General Buller a step was being taken towards the satisfaction of the wishes and aspirations of the Irish people.

Mr. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg, said, he desired to know whether the Government would undertake to lay on the Table the instructions and orders that had been given to General Buller? Would they let the House know definitely and distinctly what he was going to do and how he was going to do it? At present they had no distinct statement of what was equally important—namely, of what he was not going to do. Was he going to supersede County Court Judges? He must have civil power in that case. Was he to try common civil cases? Because he thought if they looked they would find that the statement now made was totally different from that previously made with reference to the appointment both in this House and "elsewhere." It was now a purely civil appointment; but when it was first announced it was almost entirely a military one. They had been told by an eminent authority that it was the "absolute determination of the Government to use to the utmost all the existing powers of the ordinary law and all the powers of the existing Military and Police Forces." It followed that General Buller was to have the entire control, not simply as a Civil Magistrate, of the Military as well as the Police Forces. They were told, on the one hand, that the opposite side were not going to have coercion; but, on the other, that they were going practically to introduce martial law. He wanted to know the distinction. He wanted to know was it to be coercion, or was it to be martial law? It was not worth while spending many words over if the Government would only have the kindness to give them the information; but it was worth while spending a good many words about if the Government would not instruct them.

Mr. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) said, he desired to ascertain the grounds upon which the Government had selected General Buller. He believed the gallant General was a distinguished officer in the Zulu War. There was no doubt he distinguished himself on that occasion. But how did he distinguish himself? He was chiefly distinguished as the leader of a body of Irregular Cavalry that operated in the war; and the operations of that body were, he believed, very irregular even in war itself. He wanted to give only two illustrations of the spirit and style in which General Buller carried out the instructions and conducted the operations intrusted to him by quoting very briefly from letters of Mr. Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent, who, it was understood, was a great admirer of General Buller. In one letter Mr. Forbes said—

"Here Buller joined us, but he was not very gay before he had taken his full toll of Zulu blood."

In a subsequent letter occurred the following:—

"Colonel Buller three days ago took out a strong detachment of that strange but wonderfully efficient force of indiscriminate ruffians who serve under him, under the name of Irregular Cavalry, on a two days' expedition. . . . Reaching the bed of the White Umvolosi on the first evening, by daylight on the second morning he engaged in the annexation of cattle. The people in charge of these cattle made a feeble resistance and were not warriors, but policy demanded that a certain number of them should die for the sake of creating an impression, and about a dozen of them fell under the fire of Buller's men."

Now, he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was at that time Colonial Secretary, so that he must have been aware of the character of these proceedings; and he should like very much to know whether it was for such services as those that General Buller had been selected for appointment to the present post?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): Sir, I should have taken no part in this discussion, because I had, as I think, already answered the questions which the right hon. Gentleman and other speakers have asked as to the terms of Sir Redvers Buller's appointment, but for the outrageous attack—for I can characterize it by no other epithet—which has been made upon that gallant and distinguished officer by the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. H. J. Wilson). It is perfectly true that I was Colonial Secretary at the time General Buller was engaged in active operations in the Zulu War; and it is also true, and there are many in this House who, knowing that gallant General well, will, in this, confirm me when I say that it is also true that General Buller is as humane as he is brave. And to bring forward such charges against General Buller in this House, on the word of a newspaper correspondent, without the faintest shadow of proof, is, I will venture to say, an outrage on the name and fame of that gallant officer. Sir, we have selected General Buller to go to Kerry because we believe from his experience that he will act constitutionally, justly, humanely, uprightly, and firmly in the task with which he is intrusted. I have stated what his appointment is in answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. E. R. Russell), who, I think, would hardly have brought forward this Motion if he had previously considered the terms of my answer. I stated that General Buller had a civil appointment in Kerry, and not a military command. [Mr. WADDY: What civil appointment?] I stated, in answer to a previous Question of the hon. Member for Glasgow, that General Buller's civil appointment would give him the powers that are possessed in Ireland by other Divisional Magistrates, and I believe that those powers will be sufficient to enable him to do that work of reorganization for the detection and prevention of crime with which he is charged. The difference between General Buller's appointment and theirs is this—that his is a temporary mission, while theirs are permanent appointments. General Buller, having regard to the circumstances—the special and difficult circumstances—of this case, and to the fact that he may have to act at very short notice, is expected largely to act for himself; and he is only to report to and communicate to me in order to insure rapidity of action in any direction in which he may think it desirable to move. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) asked a question as to the relations of General Buller with the Royal Irish Constabulary. I stated the precise official relations between General Buller and the Inspector General of Constabulary the other night. The right hon. Gentleman my Predecessor in Office (Mr. John Morley) knows very well that Captain Plunket, at this moment Divisional Magistrate of Kerry, is not under the authority of the Inspector General—no more is General Buller. But I should like to read what the Inspector General, without any previous communication from me, has telegraphed with reference to General Buller's appointment. He says—

"General Buller will receive from myself and all the Royal Irish Constabulary officers the most hearty support, and it will be a great pleasure to me to co-operate with him to the fullest extent of my ability and power."

Dr. COMINS (Roscommon, S.) said, no answer had been given to the question whether General Buller would have the whole civil and military command in the counties of Clare and Kerry? They had been told that General Buller's appointment was a civil one; but in regard to the military part of it the Treasury Bench would not say whether he still held it or not. He thought that the Government should tell the House whether General Buller had retired from his military command, and also whether, by his civil appointment, he would take precedence of the Lords Lieutenant of Kerry and Clare, who in that capacity made out the Commission of the Peace for their counties, and whether he would be above the Sheriffs of those counties? If he held both these appointments, as a magistrate he would be able to read the Riot Act, and thereupon as a soldier he would have the command of the troops, and could order them to fire on the people if he thought right to do so without any control from the civil authority. If he was so minded, he could act exactly as he acted in Zululand; and that was the position which the Treasury Bench were trying to cloak. They knew that soldiers might be imported into Clare and Kerry and quartered upon the farmers, innkeepers, and others, who would have to maintain them; and he would like to know whether, under these two appointments, General Buller would not have the right of free quartering upon the people? He thought that the only precedent for such an appointment as this was the appointment by Cromwell of his Courts of Major Generals as the first step towards the despotism which he soon afterwards established over this country. Those Courts had been extended by Cromwell to Ireland when he had perfected the system in this country, and they had become known as Cromwell's slaughter-houses. He only hoped that the proposed proceedings would not get a title of that kind. He thought that the House should express a strong opinion upon the danger of such an appointment as this, which would only aggravate the evils which existed in those counties. He did not believe that the noble Lord would treat the opinion of the Irish people, as expressed by their Representatives, in the cavalier way he had in his speech. The appointment he held was an unconstitutional one; and he thought, in view of the feeling expressed by Members of the House, that the Government should withdraw from it. He reminded hon. Members on the opposite Benches that the Irish Police were really as much a portion of the Forces of the Crown as the Royal Guards, being directly under the authority of the Crown, and officered by the Crown, and were even called the Royal Irish Constabulary. He deprecated as much as anyone the crime which existed, and he would like to see crime put down; but crime must be put down by the even-handed force of the law. The law was strong enough to put down crime by regular means; and crime could not be put down by irregular ways. Such irregular ways only gave excuse to people who committed crime; at all events, it got sympathy for them when otherwise they would have no sympathy whatever. He would also like to know the particular fitness of Sir Redvers Buller. Had he any skill as a policeman? Did he know the people of the district, or was he acquainted with the habits of the conspirators? He hoped the Mover of the Adjournment would take a division upon his Motion, and that the division would be such that the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) would be forced to respect the opinion of the House.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, whatever might have been thought of this question when it was first started, there could now be no doubt whatever that one of the gravest Constitutional questions had been raised at a very critical moment. The proceedings of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night had filled him with indignation. A question of urgency had been submitted to the Speaker, and a large body of hon. Members had risen to endorse the view that the question was urgent. Under these circumstances, what was the treatment to which the Leader of the House subjected a large body of its Members? After a speech, in which he delivered himself of his own view, he intimated that the Government would have nothing more to say upon the subject, whatever other information might be laid before the House, or whatever opinion might be expressed. He regarded that as a most unconstitutional and most offensive treatment of the House. He believed they might look through the history of the Leadership of the House, whether under Liberal or Tory Governments, and they would fail to find an instance in which the House had been treated with such contempt. The foolishness and short-sightedness of the course taken by the noble Lord had already been made patent, for after his distinct declaration that, however long this discussion might be continued, no Member of the Government would take part in it, the next most important Member of the Government, the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), rose and expressed his surprise that the character of General Buller should be attacked, and that quotations should be made from newspaper correspondents as to the gallant General's antecedents. In this country, with regard to the conduct of military and naval officers in foreign countries, or in distant parts of the Empire, we were obliged, in the first instance, to depend—and very often we had to depend exclusively—upon the reports of independent witnesses writing for the Press for an account of what was happening in distant countries where our troops were engaged. While it might suit the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to try to maintain the character of Sir Redvers Buller, the people of this country would look with anxiety and alarm at the antecedents of this English General, because they had been unable to learn from any Member of the Government that this English General had any other qualifications for the post to which he had been appointed. They were still in the dark as to an important part of General Buller's functions. They were to be told that General Buller was to be clothed with civil authority, and made a Civil Magistrate; but he was to be responsible to no one except the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. What they wanted to know was, whether he had been stripped of his military power? Was he to be invested with two authorities? Did he go as a double-barrelled gun, having both civil authority and military power in his hands? They were told that his appointment as a magistrate was only temporary. But how temporary? How did they know that the course the Government were pursuing, instead of extinguishing lawlessness or mitigating it, might not increase it? He remembered the time when there were riots in the North of England. The people then had this great safeguard, that the military force could not be employed except upon the authority of the magistrates known in the locality. If the substitution of civil authority for military authority had been proposed in the North of England, the people would have risen in arms against it. The noble Lord had suggested—and it showed the spirit in which he was disposed to treat hon. Members of the House—that this discussion had been originated in order to offer embarrassment to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), and so prevent the House hearing him. Those who carried their noses low caught more disagreeable smells than other people. But the motive which the noble Lord attributed to many hon. Members of the House was one which had not entered into their thoughts for a moment. The Motion was brought forward because it was found out that Sir Redvers Buller was immediately going to Ireland. Whether the modern relationship between the noble Lord and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had placed the noble Lord in possession of special information he did not know, but the noble Lord was in error. He could only augur the worst results as to the Leadership of the House from the way in which the noble Lord had conducted the Business of the House that evening.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince) said, he knew General Sir Redvers Buller well. He was a man of remarkable ability and of tried administrative capacity and humane man, and as attached to the Constitution as any hon. Gentleman in that House; and, in his opinion, the Government had intrusted the administration of the law in Kerry to most capable hands. He could assure the House that if Sir Redvers Buller found that any landlord in Kerry was really abusing his power and authority he was just the man who would not be slow to tell him so. Therefore he sincerely trusted and appealed to hon. Gentlemen, if they wished that the state of anarchy which prevailed in Kerry should be put down without bloodshed or harshness, not to interfere with the arrangements which the Government had made, and to refrain from doing anything to prevent General Buller from carrying out and discharging his difficult duty, a duty which would probably be as unpalatable to him as it would be to any military officer or any man to whom it might be entrusted.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said, he had been strongly impressed with—and he agreed with the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth)—the impropriety of the tone the Leader of the House had adopted with reference to the subject before it. The noble Lord amused the House and they had a hearty laugh over it; but he could assure the House that this appointment was not a subject for laughter to the people of Ireland. It was possible, it was likely, that before Sir Redvers Buller left Kerry it would be found to be no subject for laughter for the people of England. They had in Ireland precedents for proceedings like this, although they might not have had them in English history for a long time past; but he challenged any hon. Member in the House to look back to the history of Ireland and to see what were the results which followed in any single instance in which a military officer was employed to take a similar charge, and what had been done over and over again might be attended with similar results. Disturbances were aggravated, the people were possessed with fury, and martial law was rigorously enforced. It was such proceedings and the action of the military officers and the memories which these had left behind in the minds of the Irish people which made Ireland such a trouble to this country to-day. It had been said that they were sending Sir Redvers Buller because he was known to be an able and intelligent man. Were there no men of that description among the civil servants of the Crown in Ireland, who knew, moreover, something of the country, and in the great establishment of magistrates of Ireland men who had much special training in the repression of crime in Ireland, that they could not be got, but that the Government must go to the military and select this hero from Zululand? How, he asked, would the people of Kerry take the appointment? That was an important question, involving an objection sufficient to condemn the appointment in the minds of the people of Ireland, and he contended that their opinion was entitled to some respect on this matter. Englishmen ought to ask themselves the question how the people of Kerry would regard the appointment. Would the people look upon the appointment as an honest effort on the part of the Government to put down crime and restore order? Nothing of the sort. They would look upon Sir Redvers Buller as a man who, to use the words of the Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury), was sent to take command of the district in the interests of the landlords, and to put down by whatever force might be necessary every disorder which interfered with the exterminating policy being carried on there. Let them consider what possible reasons could be alleged in favour of the appointment of such a man as Sir Redvers Buller, or the appointment of any military man at all. What was the work that lay before him when he went down to Kerry? Would he find any force in arms against Her Majesty? Could any hon. Member of the House state a single instance of open resistance to the law in Kerry for the last 10 years? He defied anyone to do so. There had been no such resistance, and he defied the Government to bring forward a single case which General Buller would have to deal with which was not connected with a secret association, the offspring of a process of the worst oppression and tyranny which had ever been practised upon a civilized people. The people of Kerry had been tortured and oppressed by their landlords to such an extent that, although they dreaded and hated the "Moonlighters," they dreaded and hated the landlords more, and it was because of that that the people did not inform against "Moonlighters," and assist to bring them to justice, even when they could. The work to be done in Kerry was not to put down resistance to the law, because there was none, but to break up a secret association. Would any man in that House tell him that Sir Redvers Buller was by training and experience as a soldier the man to deal with a secret association? It was detective work that was required, and if General Buller was sent to Kerry because he was a good detective that only showed that he was not fit to be a soldier. The training of a soldier was rather calculated to incapacitate him for the work required. What was wanted in Kerry to put down this secret association was fair law and justice. Do justice to the people of Ireland and the "Moonlighters" would be heard of no more. He supposed General Buller would have power to call out the military, and to have military patrols in Kerry. Probably one of his first acts would be to have the roads patrolled at night by military. What security, then, was there that Sir Redvers Buller would not consider that every young man found outside his father's door at night in Kerry was a "Moonlighter," and that he should be treated as a rebel in arms? ["Oh!" and cheers.] With ominous cheers from the Ministerial Benches the statement had been received that he would deal with the "Moonlighter" as he would with a rebel found in arms. [Renewed cheers.] Again the statement was cheered, and by that cheer they mean to say that every young man in the county of Kerry who chose to go outside the door of his father's house after dark was to be shot down like a rebel. ["No, no!"] Everything was left to the discretion of General Buller. What power would General Buller have under the Act passed against his (Mr. Dillon's) repeated protest in that House? Under the Arms Act, he might billet soldiers in any house in Kerry. The power of billeting might be turned into a most cruel instrument of oppression. Under this Act, he would have power to break into any house in the county of Kerry under the pretence of searching for arms, and this power again might be used for purposes of oppression. One of the chief things that had embittered the Irish people against the administration of the English law was the unfair way in which the Arms Act had been enforced in different parts of the country. Thus, in the South of Ireland, people had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment under the provision of that Act for the illegal possession of arms, while no sentences whatever had been imposed upon the inhabitants of Belfast for similar offences, although many of them were proved to have not only illegally possessed arms, but to have used them for the purpose of firing upon the Queen's troops. This new appointment was no laughing or joking matter in Ireland. To the Irish people it was a most serious matter, and it was a matter well worthy the consideration of the House. The result of the appointment would be twofold in Kerry—it would increase and intensify the character of the disturbances, and consequently would increase and intensify the hatred that exists among the people to English law, while it would inspirit the Kenmares and the landlords of Kerry to carry on their campaign in Kerry. For 25 years before this exterminating campaign commenced in January, and 1,600 people had been sent to the hedges and ditches, there was no "Moonlighting" and no outrage.

Mr. Dillon

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the state of Kerry was not the Question before the House, but the appointment of a military officer.

MR. DILLON said, he bowed to the ruling of the Speaker, but thought his remarks were pertinent, as Kerry was the district to which General Buller was to be sent. He wished to know whether General Buller would have the power of calling into the district extra military and extra police; whether the extra police would be charged on the people; whether he would have the power of quartering troops on the people of the district; whether he would have the power of ordering arrests; whether he would have power to examine prisoners in secrecy; and whether he would have any control over the magistrates in the infliction of sentences? These were questions the Government had not answered at all, and yet they were questions of the utmost importance to the people of the district. When Mr. Clifford Lloyd was in control of the district he surrounded whole villages with a large force of military and police, and arrested everyone whom he thought capable of doing any mischief. He held his Courts secretly in barns and other buildings, and excluded the Press, so that it was impossible to know what transpired except from the prisoners themselves. He refused bail in cases where the accused were entitled to it. He (Mr. Dillon) wished to know whether this sort of terrorism was to be carried out now, and whether General Buller was to order the magistrates of the country to refuse bail for certain classes of offences, where, in their own discretion, they would accept bail? He wished to know whether he was to have the power to direct the magistrates as to the infliction of sentences under the Arms Act? He could not but believe that the Government were only training General Buller for the Coercion Act which they were about to pass subsequently—that it was not Kerry they had in their minds, but the whole of Ireland. If General Buller had any reputation, he was most likely to leave it behind him among the "Moonlighters" of Kerry. General Buller had a tough task before him. He had won a reputation, and not a very enviable one, in Zululand; and he would have better consulted his name, his honour as a soldier, and the character of the uniform he wore, if he had declined to place himself in the position of head detective to break up a secret society.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) said, he would like to point out that the Government were responsible for the administration of law and order; and the Constitution of the country conferred upon the Government certain powers, among others that of appointing officials. On this occasion the Government were not proposing to ask Parliament for any special or exceptional powers. If they were, he could have understood why such a discussion should have arisen. But as they did not ask exceptional powers, the Government were responsible, in carrying out their powers, to keep within the limits of the law and the Constitution. The Irish need have no fear of any illegal act on the part of General Buller or the Government, because the Government, although they were the Government, could not go beyond the limits of the Constitution, and could not confer any rights or powers which the law did not confer upon themselves. That being so, he thought hon. Members on his side of the House must see the very inconvenient position in which they were placing right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. Some day—and he cared not how soon in certain circumstances—the Gentlemen forming the Front Opposition Bench now might be occupying again the Front Bench opposite; and if such a question arose, would they not be the first to say—Why should the House of Commons interfere in a matter which the law had delegated to the Executive Government of the country, and for which the Executive of the country was alone responsible? He, therefore, held that so long as the Executive simply acted on the law as at present existing, so long as they did not come to Parliament and ask for exceptional powers, the duty of the House of Commons was to leave the administration of the law in the hands of those who, by the Constitution, were responsible for it. He felt that they would be adopting a precedent which would be most inconvenient and likely to seriously embarrass the procedure of any future Liberal Government if they interfered in this matter.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) said, he had been a long time associated with the county of Kerry. He knew something of the history of the people, and of the causes which had led to the necessity for the appointment of Sir Redvers Buller. He should not be discharging his duty as an Irish Member if he did not enter his protest against the policy which Her Majesty's Government were pursuing in taking the administration of the law in Kerry and Clare out of the hands of the men who had ordinarily administered it in those counties, who knew those counties and knew the circumstances of those counties, and who had been associated with the administration of the law there for years, and placing it in the hands of a man who had never yet set foot in Ireland. What explanation did Her Majesty's Government give of the manner in which they cashiered Captain Plunket, the Divisional Magistrate who had charge of Kerry and Clare? One of the reasons why they (the Irish Members) objected to this appointment, regarded it with the gravest suspicion, and thought it dangerous to the peace of Ireland and likely to exasperate the people was that, while Sir Redvers Buller would exercise civil powers, he would continue to hold his military appointment. It was believed that Sir Redvers Buller had not been sought by the Government to go to Ireland; but that in pursuance of his military instruction, and in obedience to the gossip which he heard in London, he had volunteered his services for a duty which must bring him into conflict with the people. So far as he (Mr. T. C. Harrington) and his Colleagues were concerned, if Sir Redvers Buller went to Ireland with the intention of only addressing himself to the extermination of "Moonlighting" in Kerry, to restore social order, and if he discharged that duty in an impartial manner, he would have their heartiest support; but his (Mr. T. C. Harrington's) knowledge of the administration of the law in that country forced him to the conviction that when men of that class went to the country they placed themselves in connection with the local magistrates, who were all landlords. No one had more reason than he and his Colleagues to sympathize with any genuine effort to extirpate crime. At risk and danger to themselves they had endeavoured to grapple with it. But the policy of the Government was not of that character. He warned the Chief Secretary that he had, to some extent, been made a dupe in this business, and that while he was to be responsible to him, Sir Redvers Buller was really sent to Ireland with wholly undefined powers—for the Government were not even agreed as to the powers he should possess—and for a purpose which the Chief Secretary did not know. The real men who had been at the root of all the evil, and who, during the last six years, had promoted outrage and crime by evicting more than 1,000 tenants, and who bred discontent in that part of the country, he would tell the Government were not the agitators, but the landlord class.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [19th August]—[See page 96.]

And which Amendment was,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words,—“And humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fear that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing widespread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

Debate resumed.

TENANT FARMERS (IRELAND)—EVIC- TIONS FROM INABILITY TO PAY RENT.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said, that the Amendment was the solemn expression of the opinion of the Irish people.

[Sixth Night.]

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. FLYNN, resuming, said, Boards of Guardians and other public bodies in every part of the country had passed resolutions denouncing evictions, and calling upon the Government to put a stop to them; and the question for the Government now was whether they would take the advice of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), or the advice of the Members who really represented Ireland? The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when speaking on the Address, referred in flippant tones to the agricultural distress in Ireland, and to the fall of prices in agricultural produce; and other speakers who followed him from the same side of the House treated the matter in very much the same spirit. But this depression was very real, and if, in consequence of it, farmers were unable to pay their rent and were evicted, the injury would not fall upon one class alone, but upon all classes of the community. The landlord himself would suffer, because no one in Ireland would take a farm from which a tenant had been evicted—the land would fall out of cultivation. In such a case not only would a large number of farms become vacant, and a large number of farmers ruined, but the demand for labour would be lessened, and the trade and commerce in the smaller towns, now stagnant, would become altogether destroyed. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, in his speech the previous evening, compared the landlords of Ireland to traders, and contended that the debt of the landlord was the same as the debt of any other trader; but in the eyes of the law, and evidently in the eyes of the House of Commons, a debt due to a landlord was a much more sacred thing than any other debt, because the ordinary creditor would not destrain and evict a tenant. They contended that in the present state of Ireland the shopkeepers and merchants in the towns and villages would be victimized to a large extent if the landlords persisted in this policy of eviction, because the ruin of the farming classes meant also the ruin of the traders. Great stress had been laid on the fact that judicial rents ought not to be altered; but the Members of the Party to which he (Mr. Flynn) belonged took great exception to the statements that had been made with regard to these judicial rents; and in endeavouring to controvert the statement that the payment of the present rents was in many cases an impossibility the Government and their supporters indulged in nothing but assertion and arguments of the most empty character. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the House that there was no such fall in the price of Irish produce as would justify a reduction of rents. What proof did the Government want that there was a fall in the price of Irish produce? It was to be seen in every newspaper in the United Kingdom. Did the Government imagine that the Irish Members, many of them men of business, would come to the House and say that there was a fall in the price of Irish produce of from 40 to 50 per cent, without proof of the statement? Such statements as were put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were made for the purpose of controversy only; but they certainly would not satisfy men of business who went into the question. The noble Lord had stated that the fall in the price of Irish butter was due to the quality, and to adulteration. If the noble Lord had known anything about Irish butter, he would have known that the fall in the price had been most marked lately, and that, although there were complaints about the quality some years ago, it had markedly improved within late years. The price of butter in the Cork Market regulated the price all over Ireland, and in Great Britain. He would show there had been a steady decline in the price of Irish butter with a steady advance in the quality of late years; and he asked the House to take the word of business men, speaking on matters with which they were familiar, rather than the ipse dixit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The difference between the prices for Cork butter in 1881-2-3 and 1886 showed that there had been a falling-off in prices between the first and the last of these years up to last Saturday of 33 per cent. Second and third qualities of butter had fallen off in a greater proportion during the same period, nor had this depression been confined to butter. The falling-off in the prices of other products was almost as marked. It was for this reason that the Irish Members asked the House to stand between the Irish landlords and their tenants in the coming winter. He asserted that there was in Ireland no disinclination to pay a fair rent; but the people could not pay a rent which was impossible. It was for this reason that the Irish Members asked the Government to take some action in the matter before the winter season. It was for this purpose that the Amendment was framed; and they hoped that the Government would accept it, and not take an infatuated course in the interest of one particular class. In warning the Government of the consequences that were sure to follow a certain course of policy, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) spoke in a tone of emotion, which it was most unjust to describe as "cold-blooded." If the Government, with their eyes open ignored the warnings of Irish Members, they would incur a serious responsibility. Should any system of organized eviction be entered upon, the Irish Members would stand by their people in every legal effort they might make in resistance. Their duty was clear both in the House and out of it.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had defended the hon. Member for Cork

Mr. Parnell from the attacks made on him by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket). That right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, did not attack the hon. Member for Cork because he prophesied that outrage and disorder would take place in Ireland during the coming winter, but because of the spirit in which those words were uttered. Nothing had been more instructive or astonishing in the course of the debate than the sympathy which had been shown in some quarters with those respectable gentlemen the "Moonlighters." "No, no!" The idea that they should meet with their deserts, and should suffer the penalty of death, which they had incurred, made the blood of hon. Members opposite run cold. They knew very well that it was the agitation which had taken place in Ireland during the last few years which had caused the disorder and outrages which had occurred. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) seemed to think there must be some legitimate grievance in Ireland, and that the government of England over Ireland had, to a certain extent, failed. But he (Viscount Cranborne) must remind the House that it had not been the fate of the Conservative Party to govern Ireland for many years in this century, and if there had been failure in the government of Ireland, the disorder which had resulted could not be laid at the door of the Conservative Party. It never entered the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite that no Government however good, that no policy however sound, could necessarily remove the discontent. A Government could insure that the law should be respected, and that all legitimate grievances should be removed; but it could not insure that all classes and ranks in a nation should be contented. That must depend upon the nation itself. The fact that discontent existed did not prove that the policy of the law was wrong. The murderer who was condemned to be hung was probably discontented; but that did not prove that the law under which he was going to suffer was wrong. And so in a civil suit. The party in a case against whom the verdict was given was probably discontented; but that did not prove that the verdict was wrong. Government could not insure that the people of Ireland should be contented. The best chance that that result would take place was that the Government should be respected, should be strong and firm in its policy. Depend upon it the sympathy of nine people out of ten was with the strong. The Conservative Party was far stronger than it had been for many years, and the people of England and Ireland would sympathize and support it. Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite had found great fault with the policy of the Government. It had been commonly said that the Government would not say anything at all about their policy, and hon. Members from Ireland had threatened a great deal of obstruction and protraction, because they thought the Government was going to say nothing about their policy; but the Government had said something about their policy, and yet he had found no difference in the loquacity of the Irish Members. But though Her Majesty's Government had announced their policy, which he believed was a sound policy, there had been a distinct attempt by Her Majesty's Opposition to force that policy, and the speeches of the Government that supported it, into a meaning which it could not be said to bear. The right hon. Gentleman who led the Opposition and his Friends and the hon. Member for the City of Cork appeared to know a great deal about the policy of the Government, and imagined there would be a vast expenditure of money, which they alleged the Government would take out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. On the Conservative side of the House they did not profess to know as much of the details of the policy of the Government as hon. Members opposite; but if it were true—which he imagined to be entirely contrary to the fact—that the Government were in the future going to place a large burden on the English taxpayer, it would say a great deal for the Government's disinterestedness. They were constantly taunted with holding on to Office, and at the same time with laying on large burdens. Both these charges could not be supported. He believed himself that the policy of the Government would benefit Ireland, and that the Commission would tend greatly to the advantage both of this country and of Ireland. The reasons for the non-payment of rent in Ireland were patent to all. In the first place, and in the main, it was due to the agitation over which the hon. Member for Cork presided. But, undoubtedly, there were other difficulties in certain parts of Ireland, as there must be in any country, which would render it difficult for some of the inhabitants to meet the obligations into which they had entered. The number of those individuals, however, was exceedingly limited, and their failure to meet their obligations was also limited. The hon. Member for Cork had said that the tenants in Ireland had trusted to this Parliament; and was this Parliament going to desert them? There was no question of desertion. It was not proposed that the rents should be in any way increased. If the Party opposite were to be believed, the Government were going to be so foolish as to pay half the rent of the tenants they were going to desert. It was not only the tenants that had trusted the Parliament; the landlords of Ireland had trusted the Government. ["Oh, oh!"] They foolishly believed that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) passed his Bill in 1881 the small rents which were left to them would remain secure; but, in view of what had happened, what other course could the Government take but to inquire? Unfortunately, in recent years there had been too much insecurity to the landlords of Ireland. They were like the Pashas of a Turkish Province. No doubt, hon. Members opposite would say that, though the tenants had in no sense been deserted by Parliament and the Government, yet, in the coming winter, they would be at the tender mercies of their landlords, which would end in wholesale eviction. ["Hear, hear!"] He could not understand how hon. Members made that out. Though the unfortunate Irish landlords, knowing the insecurity of their tenure, had been, in some cases, tempted to exact the uttermost farthing from the tenants, as a class they had resisted the temptation. [Laughter.] He repeated what he had said, and rejoiced that they had so resisted; but, after all, the insecurity of the landlords was the danger of Ireland. Restore once more security to the landlords. Let them know that the word of a Parliament and of a Government was not to be set aside for any light Parliamentary advantage. Let them know that at least one Party in the State was prepared to defend and fulfil the obligations into which the Parliament of this country had entered, and nine-tenths of the real agrarian grievances in Ireland would be at an end. If he wanted any proof of the real advantages and benefits of the policy announced by Her Majesty's Government it was the attitude of the hon. Member for Cork. ["Hear, hear!"] The irritation of the hon. Member was openly manifested. No doubt, the hon. Member was afraid when he saw a strong Government in power. [Laughter.] He did not mean merely strong in numbers, but strong in policy. He was well aware that if the Government succeeded in removing the last vestiges of real grievances in Ireland, they would have gone a long way to destroy the power of the hon. Member and deprive him of the support he received from the other side of the Atlantic. By this Amendment the House was asked to vote, practically, that evictions should be stopped in Ireland. Could there be anything more unreasonable than that, because a few tenants in one small part of Ireland were unable to meet their obligations, the landlords all over Ireland should be deprived of the rent to which they might have a claim? For, of course, if this Parliament were to enact that evictions should cease in Ireland, it would for the time being put a stop altogether to the payment of rent in that country. That being the case, he did not think there could be any doubt in the minds of hon. Members, whether on his own side of the House or on the Benches opposite, provided they were not absolutely bewildered by partizan spirit and by irritation at the result of the late General Election, that his noble Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Her Majesty's Government should be supported in the division which he hoped would be taken that evening.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE (Armagh, S.) said, that the distress in both England and Ireland was due to the fact that the people in both countries were divorced from the soil which they tilled. The people of Ireland protested, with all their might, against being made mere surface-holders. The Members of that House daily prayed that the earth might bring forth fruits, but for whom? Not for the tiller, but for the landlord. But the law was not always consonant with natural or Divine law. While the New Testament had said the tiller should be the first, British law said he should be the last, to share the fruits of the soil, with the result that the people were reduced to a state of comparative servitude. Everyone who was too lazy to work was, in fact, placed on the shoulders of the tiller of the soil. One of the reasons why the landlords were maintained by England in Ireland was because they were supposed to be a peculiarly loyal class; but that was not true. It was not true from 1641-5, nor in 1685-9, when it might be truly said that every time that British Sovereigns were driven from the Throne those men were found in the ranks of their enemies. Since 1841 4,000,000 of the people of Ireland had been done to death by the landlords of Ireland. The world was said to be the reflex of a man's own conduct. So, as it was with individuals, it had been with nations. If nations wanted the loyalty of the people subject to them, there was a way in human affairs by which men's hearts could be captivated. But what had the Parliament done to attract the loyalty of the people of Ireland, and what had they refused to do for the landlords? There were now 50,000 British troops in that country, lent to the landlords to maintain the British law, contrary to the natural and the Divine law. There must be some consistency in the policy of the country. They could not vote £20,000,000 to rescue the negroes of the West Indies from slavery, and, at the same time, render the people of England and Ireland slaves. It was because the people of Ireland urged that the soil of the country should belong to them that English Governments were face to face so frequently with the Irish difficulty. Owing to the severity of foreign competition, the tenants of Ireland, as well as those of England and Scotland, were unable to pay the rents exacted by the landlords. In his opinion, the real cause of agricultural depression was the holding of large tracts of territory by men who rendered no services to the State in return. They did not labour, but merely received money which others had earned, investing it securely and profitably in stocks. It was said that Britons never would be slaves; but millions of the people of England were divorced from the soil, and with what result? There were the workmen of the City of London, who starved last winter, and whom he had seen scrambling for bread; while the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted millions to be voted for the war in Burmah. Inquests were held in numbers last winter on men who were done to death in England through being divorced from the soil of their own country. They came to London to compete in a market already overstocked with labour, and the consequence was that they starved. In fighting the battle of Irishmen they were, in fact, fighting the battle for Englishmen. If that House did not remedy the present state of affairs, Englishmen, far faster than Irishmen, would remedy it for them. In these days, when steamers of 6,000 or 8,000 tons were constantly making the most rapid passages across the Atlantic Ocean, it was simply impossible that the cultivators of the soil in countries where rent was paid could compete with countries where no rent was paid. Talk of the depression of trade! The simple fact was that the agriculturists of England and Ireland were done to death by the American competition, carried on in these large and rapid steamers, each of which carried a cargo equal to the produce of half a county. What was the cause of the depression of trade? It was the giving large tracts of land to people who returned nothing to the State, either in the payment of taxes or in the labour, which was the only source of wealth.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not speaking to the specific Amendment before the House.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE said, that he dealt with social order in Ireland, and that was connected with the Land Question.

MR. SPEAKER: I must insist upon the hon. Member adhering to the terms of the Amendment—that of the hon. Member for Cork, to which I would call his attention.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE, after recapitulating his argument with regard to the effect of American competition upon the English and Irish cultivators, said, that he thought it not too much to ask an Assembly like that to say that the tiller of the soil should, according to the New Testament, be the partaker of the fruits thereof. But the present system was sweeping away the bread-stuffs from before the eyes of the man who produced them in order to support landlords. In conclusion, he most energetically complained that the landlords of Ireland were the administrators of the law and the judges in their own cause, a state of things which, he contended, was most unfair, and contrary to all the principles of justice. He appealed to the Radicals in the House, whose cause the Irish Members were fighting as well as the cause of the poor, oppressed people of Ireland, to vote for the Amendment now before the House.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) said, he had no intention to prolong the debate; but he wished to correct a slight misunderstanding that appeared to exist with regard to the remarks of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson) on the previous day, as to the propriety of the English people putting their hands into their pockets for the benefit of Ireland. His hon. and gallant Friend had not expressed a desire that English money should be forthcoming in aid of Irish landlords, but had simply asked that England should aid in the development of Irish industries, as a compensation for the injury done in past times by the crushing of the industries of Ireland. He (Colonel Waring) held quite as strongly as hon. Gentlemen opposite the view that, in that respect, England owed a debt to Ireland, and ought not to forget that certain industries in Ireland were extinguished by English jealousy. Those were industries which were instituted by the ancestors of the present English Colony, those who were afraid that they would be dealt with in a very summary manner by an Irish Parliament. ["No, no!"] He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite were responsible for the utterances of Mr. Davitt. Mr. Davitt certainly said so.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.) rose to Order, and said Mr. Davitt had emphatically repudiated the statement.

MR. SPEAKER: No point of Order arises on that.

COLONEL WARING, resuming, said, if Mr. Davitt had repudiated it, it was his misfortune not to have seen the repudiation; but, unfortunately, repudiations were pretty common. However, there was no doubt as to the establishment of these industries in the South and West by men of the same blood as those in the North, who were spoken of as the English Colony; and if they had been permitted to exist and thrive, and had not been extinguished, it was quite possible that, at the present time, from the South and West of Ireland Representatives might be sitting on his side of the House. They now simply asked Parliament to give to Ireland what was her due. Turning to the Amendment, much was said about the cruelty of evictions by the landlord; and he would admit that in the poorest parts of Ireland, where chronic poverty prevailed, the people might be unable to pay the judicial rents; but it was a different case with reference to the rest of Ireland. The hard times were undoubtedly felt by the tenants; but so they were by all other classes. It was hard that the landlord in these times should be forced to retrench, while the tenant showed no disposition to economize; and he feared that whilst the landlords had done their best to economize and retrench their expenses, many of the tenants had been going on living in the same way as they did in the good times.

Mr. Alexander Blane

He knew an instance which occurred recently. A landlord was driving into a country town with his wife, and he saw a very smart young lady whose dress his wife very much admired. The young lady proved to be one of the three daughters of a tenant of his who owed three years' rent. On that young lady's back was the equivalent of at least a quarter of a year's rent, and that quarter multiplied by her two sisters and her mother as well would have made up precisely a year's rent. The result was that the landlord had to go without his rent, whilst these young ladies got their dresses from Mantalini's, or elsewhere. That kind of thing proved that if care was exercised the tenant would be enabled to pay his debts. He admitted that eviction was a terrible thing, and, personally, he had never put it in force; but whether it might not be right to do so, under certain eventualities, he would not undertake to say. It was very difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the tenant could or could not pay, and eviction was often the final test. There was, however, hardly a landlord in Ireland who would evict a tenant whose inability to pay arose from real misfortune. But the fact was that until eviction proceedings were begun, it was impossible in many cases to know whether the tenant could really pay or not. It was wonderful what hidden resources were disclosed at the appearance of the Sheriff's officer. He was sure that the great bulk of the landlords would accept what the tenant could pay in good faith, and would not press for the remainder. The House might remember, however, that there were evictions of various kinds. A landlord might find himself under notice of ejectment if he did not meet his engagements, and who was to protect him? What was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander; and if evictions were to be prohibited on behalf of the tenant, they should be prohibited with reference to the landlord and his creditors. He would be bound to say that there were more evictions in London in a month than there were in all Ireland in the course of the year, and nothing was said about them. He could speak on the question with some freedom, as he had the honour of having been spoken of by an hon. Member from the Benches opposite as a model landlord. He did not see that it signified much whether a man was turned out on the roadside of Kerry or on the pavement of Whitechapel. He heard of no proposition to suspend evictions in England, and he might suggest to English Liberal Members that they might take that point into consideration before they began to be so very liberal with other people's property in Ireland. He observed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had now entered the House, and therefore he would at once conclude his remarks, so that he might not stand between the House and the right hon. Gentleman, whose speech the House was awaiting with interest.

MR. SPEAKER called upon Mr. Joseph Chamberlain.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I wish, Sir, to make an appeal to you upon a point of Order. I wish to know whether it is not the recognized practice that the debate should be resumed by the hon. Member who moved the adjournment on the previous day? If the hon. Member who had so moved the adjournment failed to be in his place at the resumption of the debate, is he entitled, at a subsequent period, to precedence over other hon. Members who have been here all the evening, and desire to speak?

MR. SPEAKER: If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had been in his place at the commencement of the debate, he would have claimed his right to address the House; but I see nothing to debar him from rising to address the House at a later period. I have called upon the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I am very sorry, indeed, if, on the present occasion, I stand between the House and any other hon. Gentlemen who think that they have a better right to address it. I understood, however, that there were some of my hon. Friends—I understood it from their earlier statements in the course of this debate—and that there were many other hon. Members who thought that they were entitled to require of me a statement of my views on the policy which has been proposed to us by the Government, and I certainly thought that I should probably consult their convenience best if I did not rise during the dinner hour, but took the earliest opportunity after that time, in order to make the few remarks I desire to make. I think that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell)—I do not know whether intentionally or not—has placed those who follow him in a position of considerable embarrassment. He has proposed an Amendment which I venture to say is incomplete and inconclusive. He has introduced it in a speech which was very powerful, very full, very frank, and very complete. But, Sir, by the Rules of the House, inasmuch as that speech travelled very widely beyond the terms of the Amendment, we are unable to deal with many important portions of it, and we are confined absolutely to matters which are relevant to the terms of the Amendment. Sir, the Amendment consists of two parts, to neither of which, treated solely as abstract propositions, have I myself any great objection. The first part of the Amendment expresses, in somewhat hesitating language, an apprehension that there may be considerable difficulty experienced during the coming autumn and winter in the payment of rent, that it may lead to evictions, and that evictions may endanger public order. Well, Sir, the only remark I have to make upon that is that I think, having regard to what we have been told in the course of this debate as to the enormous prices that are still being paid for the tenant right of those properties, that the terms of the Amendment are a little too general. I do not think it can be asserted that the tenants of Ireland, speaking of them as a class, are unable to pay their rents in consequence of the fall in prices. But it may well be—and I should not myself see the slightest objection to expressing an apprehension that it may be—that a portion—a minority, at all events—of these tenants may be placed in a position of considerable difficulty. But what I object to is, that it is unnecessary and superfluous to make statements of that kind in answer to the Speech from the Throne, and I say that because I think it will be agreed that it is not the practice of the House to make affirmations of that kind, unless we are prepared, at the same time, to recommend some remedy for the state of things which we fear. The case of the Irish tenants is not the only case in regard to which similar apprehensions might be expressed. There are many cases that suggest themselves to hon. Members. I will only mention one. We might address Her Majesty and say that during the coming autumn and winter, the depression of trade which has continued so long will lead to increased lack of employment, and that that want of employment, in turn, may be productive of great suffering, and may endanger social order. That may be perfectly true. My only objection to put an addition of that kind to the Address to the Throne would be that it would be useless and improper to do so, unless, at the same time, the House was prepared to deal with the subject-matter, and to find a complete and satisfactory remedy. The second part of the Amendment of the hon. Member is in the nature of what I may call an anticipatory repudiation of a policy which finds no expression whatever in the Queen's Speech, and the existence of which I understand is denied absolutely by the Members of Her Majesty's Government in this House. We know perfectly well what is the meaning of the last paragraph of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Cork. It has reference, no doubt, to a paragraph in a speech which is reported to have been spoken in "another place" by the Head of the Government. Well, Sir, according to the Rules of this House, we are not entitled to discuss matters which pass in "another place;" and I admit for the very good reason that the speakers are not here to answer for themselves, and to give the necessary explanations and corrections of their reported utterances. All I can say in addition, at the present moment, in reference to this last paragraph is, that I also deprecate any attempt to transfer the losses which may fall on the landlords owing to the circumstances of the season and other causes to the pockets of the British taxpayers. I have deprecated it before, and I deprecate it again. I do not believe that the Government would be so foolish as to make any proposition of the kind. If ever they do, all I can say is that by whatsoever Government, or under whatsoever circumstances it may be made, I shall be bound by everything that I have said in the past, and by the opinions I hold at present, to offer it the most strenuous opposition in my power. But, Sir, that is one thing. As an abstract proposition it may be all very well; but, on the other hand, I beg to say that I am not going to vote for an Amendment, the carrying of which would be equivalent to a Vote of Censure on the Government. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Home Rule Members.] I quite understand that cheer. I do not wish that there should be, in the slightest degree, any mistake; I am not going to do anything to turn out this Government, as long as the Government which is to take its place is committed to a Separatist policy, which I believe would be injurious to the best interests of Ireland and of Great Britain. And, certainly, I am not going to do that on an Amendment of this kind, which is not only vague and inconclusive, but, in my opinion, is disingenuous, and which I believe may properly be described as an unnecessary affirmative and a gratuitous negative. Now, Sir, one thing that I want to know is, are my Friends who belong to the Liberal Party, who are described as Separatist Liberals, going to vote for this Amendment? [Cries of "Yes!"] Well, I observe that my right hon. Friend the late Prime Minister, who, unfortunately, is no longer with us, declared before he left the country that if he had remained he would not have voted for it. I beg my hon. Friends with whom I disagree on this one point of Irish policy to consider very carefully what they are doing. They are going, I hear some of them say, to vote for the Amendment. By so doing, they will give, no doubt, a hypothetical condemnation of a policy which, with more or less authority, is attributed to Lord Salisbury. That I dare say they will not object to; but, Sir, they are going to give an emphatic, and definite, and unequivocal condemnation of the policy of their own Leader, and of the late Government. [Cries of "No, no!"] They say "No!" but they cannot get out of it. I beg to call their attention to the words of the Amendment. The words of the Amendment are these—

"And we deprecate any extension of State-aided purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are."

What was the Land Bill of the late Government? The Land Purchase Bill of the late Government contemplated an extension of the system of State-aided purchase. [Cries of "No, no!"] There are some Gentlemen apparently who will contradict anything. I am quite sure that none of my right hon. Friends, who speak with any sense of responsibility, will deny that the Land Purchase Bill of the late Government was a Bill for the extension of State-assisted purchase—that is to say, that the price of purchase was fixed on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they are now. Therefore, I say that hon. Members behind me who vote for this Amendment are giving a Vote of Censure on the late Government very much more emphatic. [Home Rule cries of "No, no!"] Well, Sir, there are none so blind as those who will not see. In my opinion, they will be giving a Vote of Censure much more emphatic and decided than upon anything that can properly be attributed to the present Government. Well, Sir, I should like now, if the House will allow me, to consider for a few moments what is the present position of the Liberal Party with regard to this great question of Land Purchase. What is the position of the Leaders of the Liberal Party with regard to the question? Has my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) abandoned the policy of the Land Bill which he introduced into the last Parliament? He was challenged to answer that question again and again in the course of the last Election, but he never answered it. He has made two speeches in this House during the present Session, but he has not said anything upon that subject. I know that there are Liberal Members below the Gangway who have insinuated that my right hon. Friend is prepared to abandon this policy in the future, because he has found that it hampered him in the promotion of the Bill for the Government of Ireland, and that, in the future, we shall hear no more of it. Have my hon. Friends forgotten that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian declared his Bill for Land Purchase to be an obligation of honour? What could be more insulting to my right hon. Friend than to suggest, as some of his followers have dared to suggest, that for Party purposes he would abandon an obligation of honour? But if my right hon. Friend—even if it were to be supposed, which I cannot suppose—were to change his opinion on the subject, what is the position of Lord Spencer?—what is the position of my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley)? They have made no secret of it whatever. They were bold, honest, and consistent throughout the Elections in this matter. Lord Spencer said, again and again, that it would be unfair to the landlords of Ireland to hand them over entirely to the popular Party, or to the decision of the popular Party, and that they ought to be protected by some such scheme as that proposed by the late Government. My right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland has said, again and again, that the settlement of the Land Question was, to his mind, a necessary preliminary to, or, at all events, that it must accompany, any provision for the better government of Ireland by Home Rule. My right hon. Friend, in one of his latest speeches, said he would never be a party to handing over to a new authority in Dublin the settlement of the Land Question; that he held it to be an evil legacy which we were not entitled to leave to them; that in the interests of the tenants, as well as in the interests of the landlords, it was the duty of England to deal with the matter in the interests of the tenants themselves before creating a separate Parliament in Dublin. Very well, Sir, I am speaking in the presence of my right hon. Friend, and I am sure that he will say that I am not misrepresenting him. How is it possible, in the face of circumstances of that kind, that he could accept the abandonment of the policy of the Land Purchase Bill? Without speaking of details, I maintain that the fact that he is pledged to a great system of State-aided purchase of the land as a necessary preliminary accompaniment of any measure of Home Rule is as clear as the day, and it is dishonouring to my right hon. Friend the late Prime Minister and his Colleagues to suggest that they would be false to everything that they have stated on this subject in the course of the Election. But then I should like to know, if this is the position of the Leaders, what is the position of those whom I am obliged to allude to—I know they do not accept the term, but I do not use it offensively—but whom I am obliged, for the purposes of distinction, to call the Separatist Libe-

erals? ["Oh, oh!"] Well, what is their position? As far as it has been expressed in the course of the debate theirs is a position of uncompromising hostility to any scheme of Land Purchase. ["No, no!"] Oh, yes, as far as it can be gathered from the course of this debate. Let the Gentlemen behind me who are in favour of the Land Purchase scheme of the late Government get up in their places and say so. There are precious few of them who will dare to say so to their constituents. In this House Member after Member got up and said he was opposed to it, although he was in favour of the Home Rule Bill. During the Elections, of course, every Member was opposed to it, and hoped that he would hear of it no more, and said that the landlords had had their last offer, and so on. But I want to point out to these Gentlemen that their position is a very perilous one. They are in a very "parlous state." They are Dissident Liberals. I beg them—I beg my hon. Friends to take warning by me. I am to be expelled from the Liberal Party. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Home Rule Members.] It is not the Irish Members who will be able to do it. I am to be ostracized, because I, unfortunately, was unable to support the two Bills that were brought in by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian; and here we have Gentlemen who oppose one of them. Well, is it to be held that it is a capital crime to oppose two Bills, and that it is only a venial eccentricity to oppose one? No, Sir, unless my hon. Friends are prepared to swallow the Land Bill they must go out of the Party too, and a very small Party will remain. If my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), the new Leader of the Party, upon whom Elijah's mantle is to fall, but who, I think, will be found a little too small for that extensive garment—if he is to have his way the Liberal Party will become "small by degrees and beautifully less."

Mr. YEO (Glamorgan-shire, W.): I rise to Order, Sir. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Order!"] I wish to point out that the right hon. Gentleman is not speaking to the Amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER took no notice of the interruption.

Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN again rose, amid loud cries of "Order!"

and "Chair!" from the Home Rule Members.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I call upon Mr. Chamberlain.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (assuming: I say, Sir, that one by one, in squads and sections, the Liberal Party will disappear, and at last it will be reduced to the condition of a sect of which I remember to have heard in my youth, and which also bore the ominous name of "Separatist." It consisted of only two persons—a man and his wife, and the wife was heard to say at times that she had grave doubts whether her husband would be saved. And now, Sir, I turn to the Unionist Liberals. What is their opinion with regard to this question of Land Purchase? My noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) has expressed his views on the subject. Everyone will recognize that he said nothing that would commit him to oppose an extensive system of State-aided Land Purchase. It is supposed by hon. Gentlemen who are good enough to quote me, although, not accurately, and who refer to my opinions in the past, apparently without ever taking the trouble to read what I have said—it is asserted by them that I at least am committed, by what I said at the Elections, to absolute opposition to all State-aided purchase of land. That is exactly the reverse of the fact. On the contrary, I am committed by everything I have said to support, cordially and heartily, a large system of Land Purchase. [Cries of "No!"] Refer to Hansard. See what I said on the second reading of the Land Bill. I said then that I was in favour of a large scheme of Land Purchase. Why, it is made an accusation against me by some of my hon. Friends, who appear to know Cabinet secrets without being in the Cabinet, and who have made it an accusation against me, that I brought forward a large scheme of Land Purchase which was a scheme almost as extensive in principle as the scheme of my right hon. Friend, but more dangerous, and with less security to the British taxpayer than that of my right hon. Friend. However, that is a point I will not argue now; but I will argue it at the proper time. I only point to it now, in order to show that, by the confession of everyone who knows best, I have always, in private and public, been in favour of a great scheme of Land Purchase. Why did I object to the scheme of my right hon. Friend? I have always held that at the bottom of this Irish Question is the Land Question. You cannot deal satisfactorily with the Irish problem unless you can settle the agrarian problem first. I believe no settlement can be found in the system of dual ownership. It is only by the creation of a great scheme of peasant proprietorship, and doing what Germany, Russia, Bavaria, and other countries have done, that you can settle the Irish Question. You cannot create a peasant proprietorship in Ireland, except by one of two ways—either by a vast confiscation of the property of private individuals, which, as far as I know, is not advocated by any single Member of the House of Commons, or by a great scheme of State-aided purchase. That is the only practical alternative; I have never denied it, and of that I have always been in favour. But I was opposed to the scheme of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, because it involved a risk so tremendous that it amounted to a certainty of loss. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] My right hon. Friends around me are coming over to my opinion very quickly. ["No, no!"] Ah! but I will show you. When I argued this question in the last Parliament, I pointed to the statement which had been made that there had been a great fall in the price of produce. I said that if that fall in the price of produce were established, the Irish tenants would say that they were unable to pay the rents which were the basis of the scheme. If they paid less than the rents upon which the scheme was prepared, there would be a deficiency in the security, and the taxpayers would have to make it good. At that time my right hon. Friends vouchsafed no answer whatever to that representation. Now, it appears, they are equally convinced with myself that there is great danger that the fall in the price of produce, which undoubtedly has taken place, will have its effect upon Irish rents. Well, my right hon. Friend the late Prime Minister in his speech the other night referred, I think for the first time—I do not remember that he referred to it during the debates in the last Parliament—to an additional security which he said

made his scheme absolutely safe, and that was that it was backed up by the whole of the Revenue of Ireland, which was pledged for this purpose. My right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland says the land revenue—[Mr. JOHN MORLEY here interposed a remark.] Yes; that, of course, was the result. That is my contention—namely, that it was backed by the land revenue, and by nothing else. Let me examine this. My right hon. Friend says it was backed by the whole Revenue of Ireland. The only portion of the Revenue of Ireland over which this House could have had any control under my right hon. Friend's scheme was the Customs and Excise. Over them we have an absolute control, according to his scheme, and they were pledged in security for Irish rents. [An hon. MEMBER: A portion.] Yes; but there was a first mortgage upon them. My right hon. Friend and my hon. Friends behind me seem to have forgotten that. And what was that first mortgage? It was, in the first place, the whole of the share of Ireland of the National Debt; in the second place, the whole of the fixed share of Ireland towards the payment of the Army and the Navy; and also, in the third place, £1,000,000 a-year towards the cost of the Constabulary; and when all those are paid, and when the first mortgage is cleared off, what remains? Only a few hundreds of thousands. [Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER: Millions.] Nonsense! I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon; but the expression escaped me in the heat of the moment. My right hon. Friend is a great authority on this subject; but, with all deference to him, I beg to say that I cannot accept his statement. My conviction is this—that the balance of the Customs and Excise, after payment of all these things, which are the first mortgage upon it, amounted only to a few hundreds of thousands of pounds—and that is a balance which is perfectly useless for our purposes—perfectly useless as a security. The slightest variation in the collection of the Revenue, the slightest variation in the consumption of whisky, or in the payment of the duty in the locality in which the payment takes place, would destroy absolutely that security itself. I agree with the late Chief Secretary for Ireland that the land revenue was the security. Yes; but the land revenue was made up by those rents which my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) now tells us cannot be paid in the case of five-sixths of the tenants of Ireland. When did my right hon. Friend first come to that opinion? He and his Colleagues are in this dilemma—if they knew it at the time they introduced the Land Bill, why did they not tell us? Why did they not give us some intimation that the security they proposed was open to this great deduction? They could not have known it at that time. It is impossible that they could. They could not have withheld their information from the House of Commons if they had known it; and, therefore, it comes to this, that we have to place what confidence we may on the information which has only been obtained since they left Office—which is only at their disposal since they lost all access to official information. Well, Sir, but I took another objection to the Land Bill of my right hon. Friend. I said I would not be a party to lending any British money at all to what was going to be practically a foreign country. Now, that is the point to which I want to call the attention of the House and of my hon. Friends. It is one thing that the whole resources of the Empire should be devoted to adding to the happiness and prosperity of those for whom the Imperial Parliament is directly responsible, and another thing altogether to lend money to a foreign country. I will take the case of Canada. I ask whether the House would lend £150,000,000, or £15,000,000, or £1,500,000, in order to buy out the Canadian landlords? The thing has only to be stated in order that you may see the absurdity of it. But I do not want hon. Members to think because I am opposed to lending money to a self-governing Colony, or to Ireland, if it is placed in the position of a self-governing Colony, that therefore I am opposed to lending money to Ireland if it remains an integral portion of the United Kingdom. Why, Sir, what was the general controversy to which I devoted myself? I am afraid now it will appear with very little advantage in the course of the autumn. What was that controversy which was described by our opponents as concerning three acres and a cow? Why, it was a large and a just proposal that municipalities throughout the United Kingdom should be empowered compulsorily to obtain land for the purpose of creating allotments and small holdings, with the view of aiding in the creation of a peasant proprietary, and that they should be backed in this work by the credit of the State. What I would do for England and Scotland, of course I would do for Ireland, so long as she remains an integral portion of the Empire. Under these circumstances, what I have to say in conclusion on this branch of the subject is, that I wait for the definite proposals of the Government, but that I am prepared to give a favourable consideration—I would say further, a cordial support—to any proposal they may make for the establishment of a peasant proprietary in Ireland, provided that the whole arrangement is under the complete and effective control of the Imperial Parliament, and provided that it is secured by the intervention of municipal authority. Well, Sir, the Government do not propose to confine their inquiry entirely to the question of Land Purchase. They propose to inquire into judicial rents. They propose to inquire into the subject of public works; and they propose themselves to act as a Commission during the autumn and winter for the purpose of inquiry into the subject of local government. Well, I do not think that some of my right hon. Friends are justified in the ridicule which they have cast upon these proposals. The late Government came into Office as a Government of Inquiry. Does it lie in our mouth to complain that the present Government is also a Government of Inquiry? My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) referred very wittily to these projects of Commissions, and reminded us of the anecdote about the red lion. But my right hon. Friend has been a great artist in red lions himself. He has proposed to the House more than one Commission, and I do seriously say—

Mr. YEO (Glamorganshire, W. : I rise to Order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is speaking to the Amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the right hon. Gentleman is proposing to allude to other Commissions about to be issued by the Government, I think that would be travelling out of the particular terms of the specific Amendment now before the House.

Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: On the point of Order the course of my argument is this. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) proposes to declare the existence of certain grievances and his apprehension of certain evils. He does not himself propose in his Amendment any remedy for those evils; and I imagine that I am in Order in considering the remedies which he did propose in his speech, or any other remedies which may meet the grievances to which he refers. ["No!" and "Chair!"]

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the practice in our Parliamentary procedure, that when an hon. Member moves an Amendment to the Address, before he reaches that Amendment he may deviate into other matters. To a certain extent he thus places himself in an advantageous position; but when he has moved a specific Amendment, according to the Rules of the House, that specific Amendment becomes the substantive matter before the House.

Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Speaker, I was well aware that the position was, to some extent, an embarrassing one, especially if the House is not willing to extend to me the indulgence which was asked for and granted to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). Sir, I will endeavour to pass over any point which you may consider to be outside the scope of the Amendment. I had intended to refer to the Commissions, and to see how far the work of these Commissions was likely to affect a state of things which is described in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. But if you think that in doing that I shall be out of Order, of course I shall be bound to obey your ruling. I was saying—I will not refer to the personal question—I was saying this, and I really think it is a general observation to which no exception can be taken, that I do not think it is desirable, on either side of the House, that we should ridicule the idea of proceeding by inquiry. It seems to me that in all these very important matters Royal Commissions are of the greatest service to the Governments of either Party. The only exception that can be made, and the only objection that can be fairly taken to a Royal Commission, is when it is appointed for the purpose of shelving some question—

MR. W. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossary Division): Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I want to know, with all respect, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in alluding to these Commissions, and to the whole policy of the Government?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman would be in order in discussing the whole policy of the Government; and it will be in the recollection of the House that I have already restrained other Members from doing so. That liberty which, in the exercise of my duty, I have denied to other hon. Members, of course, as far as I am concerned, I cannot extend to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Then, Sir, I think I shall put it to the House whether they will be good enough to extend to me the indulgence which they have already extended to other right hon. Gentlemen? I will promise, if they will, that I will deal very briefly with this part of the subject, and I only want to allude to it to make my argument clear.

MR. SPEAKER: I must distinctly repeat that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman must be confined to the specific Amendment before the House.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.): On the question of Order, Sir, may I respectfully submit to you that if the right hon. Gentleman, by his argument, proposes to show the danger or loss to the British taxpayer, he is not entitled to proceed.

MR. SPEAKER: The question is not one to be argued after what I have already stated.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: In deference to your ruling, Sir, I will not refer to that part of the policy of the Government which is contained in the proposal to appoint the Royal Commission. I will turn to the argument of the hon. Member for Cork. What is the remedy which he proposes for the state of things which he describes in his Amendment? He has told us candidly that, in his opinion, the only remedy—the only satisfactory and complete remedy—is the establishment of an Irish Parliament in Dublin. But the hon. Member seems to forget that, even if this view were accepted, it would not in the slightest degree meet the crisis which he anticipates in November. We have to deal in the Amendment with a crisis which is declared to be imminent, with a general inability to pay rent, with numerous evictions, with consequent suffering, and with great danger to social order. How would that be met by an assertion, supposing such an assertion could be obtained from Parliament, of its intention to establish, at some future time, an Irish Parliament in Dublin? Sir, upon that point the hon. Member made a very remarkable statement. He said, in effect, that the Irish people would have accepted the Land Bill of the late Government, although they objected to the extravagance of its proposals, and that they would have paid to the uttermost farthing, so that the British taxpayers would have lost nothing, if it had been accompanied by Home Rule. Then, Sir, what becomes of the inability of the Irish people to pay taxes?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): He never said anything of the kind.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: What becomes, I say, of the inability of the Irish tenant, under these circumstances, to pay taxes? The hon. Member well knows that it is impossible to obtain from this Parliament any assertion of the kind. He expressed himself very well satisfied with the Election, and he looks forward with confidence to another appeal to the country. ["Hear, hear!" from the Home Rule Members.] Well, Sir, that is not a very hearty cheer; but if hon. Members are satisfied, so am I. I remember the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and many others in the last Parliament, thinking and saying that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would sweep the country. I ventured to warn them that they were counting without their host, and I told them, from my own knowledge, that the result would be very different from what they anticipated, and that the Unionist majority in this House would be increased. It has been increased—it has been quadrupled. I only wish to warn them once more that, if they appeal again on this subject, they may take my word for it that the result will be the same; and if they persist in going to destruction on their own account, it will be worse for them than the last Election. Well, Sir, the hon. Member for Cork made a more practical suggestion than that we should establish a Home Rule Parliament. He made this suggestion, as I understood him, that judicial rents should be revised periodically according to a sliding scale. I thought for myself that it was a very taking suggestion. I do not know how far it may be practicable; but I may say that I have received many letters from Ireland from persons who are well qualified to speak on such a subject—[Cries of "Name!"]—from land agents, from landlords—[Laughter from the Home Rule Members]—yes; and from tenants, who seem to think that in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork there may really be found a solution of the present difficulty with regard to judicial rents. Well, Sir, I know that it is very difficult for an English Member to judge these Irish questions, and I have never attempted to dogmatize about them. ["Oh."] I must say that hon. Members below the Gangway are a little unreasonable. They interrupt me when I disagree with the hon. Member for Cork. They now interrupt me because I am agreeing with him. In reference to this question of Irish opinion, I acknowledge that I should like to refer to a statement which particularly concerns myself, and which was made by the hon. Member for Cork. The hon. Member said, and said truly, that I had intended to visit Ireland and see for myself, as far as I could, the condition of the country, and consult local opinion; and he had the good taste to say that I was deterred from that visit because Mr. Healy threatened to duck me in a horse-pond. I do not believe that statement; I do not believe that Mr. Healy ever made use of any such coarse and vulgar threat. At all events, I am not aware of it. It is true that I did receive threats at that time—threats from people who told me that I should be murdered if I went to Ireland; but I did not pay much attention to them. I thought they were merely evidences of ill-restrained enthusiasm, very much of the same kind as that of the hon. Member from Ireland who spoke yesterday, and who admitted that he had, in the course of a speech, spoken of shooting landlords like partridges, but who explained that this was not to be taken seriously, because he objected to shooting even partridges. But, Sir, I did not go to Ireland for a different reason. I did not carry out my intention to proceed there because the persons who had promised me introductions to leading members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the representatives of the National opinion withdrew their promises. I found that if I went to Ireland I should be "Boycotted"—that I should be obliged to consult one side only, and that I should be unable to make the impartial inquiry which I had contemplated. I only refer to this in order to point out the inconsistency of hon. Members. Again and again, since I have been in this House, I have heard them taunt English Members and English Ministers with taking no pains to visit Ireland and make themselves acquainted with the condition of that country, and with not visiting Ireland, although they were in the habit of visiting the Continent. And then, when two Ministers proposed to devote their holiday—the first opportunity they had—to the consideration, on the spot, of these questions, hon. Members who profess to represent the majority of the people of Ireland do everything in their power to render their visit impossible and useless. But there is another point in connection with that. Hon. Members on this side of the House have referred in the course of this controversy again and again to a speech which I delivered, and in which I spoke in very strong language of the system known as Dublin Castle, and compared it with the bureaucratic system of Austria and Russia. But they quoted that as if I were in favour of a Statutory Parliament. [Cries of "Question!"] I am referring to a personal allusion that was made by the hon. Member for Cork. I say that my visit to Ireland was planned immediately after that speech, and the opposition of the hon. Members from Ireland to that visit shows that they did not, at that time, accept me as a convert to their views. Now, I want the House to consider what are the facts with regard to this question of judicial rents. I want hon. Members to look at it from both sides. In the first place, it appears to me that there are two strong arguments in favour of those who hold that the judicial rents should be maintained. There is, in the first place, the fact that when the Land Act of 1881 was passed it undoubtedly took from the landlords a legal estate and transferred it to the tenants, and that it was held out to the landlords that this sacrifice on their part would be a final sacrifice, and that the measure was one which would be absolutely adequate for the purpose of giving peace to Ireland. That was the contention of the author of the Land Act. Well, I confess it is a rather hard doctrine that the same men should be told within two or three years after the passing of the Act that it is altogether insufficient, and that the whole question must be re-opened. Then there is another point also in their favour, and that is that we are not certain, in this matter of rent, that inability to pay is the only factor in the case. We want to know whether there is a willingness to pay; and we want to know when there is a willingness to pay, whether there is any interference with that willingness to pay from any outside authority. Well, Sir, we know perfectly well—I do not believe that there is anyone who is acquainted even superficially with the state of affairs in Ireland who does not know, on good authority—of cases in which tenants have brought their rents secretly to their landlords because they were honest men, and because they were afraid lest the National League should know that they were honest, and should punish them for it. And now we want to know, in considering this question of judicial rents, are the tenants to be free to pay, if they are willing to pay, or are they to be coerced by outside agencies? The hon. Member for Cork has shown that he can exercise great influence. He has exercised it; he has undoubtedly exercised it during the last 12 months, and I believe it is owing to his means that crime has greatly decreased. Does he intend to exercise that influence in the same direction, or does he intend to provoke the people? [Cries of "Oh!" and "Withdraw!"] I am asking a question. [Renewed cries of "Withdraw!"] I certainly shall not withdraw the question, but I shall wait with great interest for an answer. We are told to look at the Chicago Convention, and we have been told in this very debate that there is a proof of the great moderation of the Irish people. Well, Sir, I should be very glad to see the signs of moderation in that Assembly. I admit that it is of great importance, for I know that where the funds are there the policy is. I have read every word of the report of the proceedings at that Convention, and what do I find? I find that one of the delegates of the Irish Parliamentary Party, specially sent over by the hon. Member for Cork—namely, Mr. John Redmond—made a speech, which was reported verbatim, on the concluding day of the Conference. That speech, we are told, was not an impromptu speech, but carefully prepared, and in it he said—"It will be the duty of the Irish Members to make the government of England in Ireland impossible." Do you adopt that? Why do you not answer? I want an answer. Do you adopt it?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, with the leave of the House, whether he will be good enough to give the context of that speech, inasmuch as it is possible to take a single sentence from any speech and distort its meaning?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. J. Redmond is reported to have made what all the reports call a fiery speech. It contains many other statements equally strong.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Read the whole speech, then.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I thought that the intention of the hon. Member was bond fide. I was going to say that the immediate context of the passage I have quoted was that—"It is impossible for England to govern Ireland;" and then there follows the paragraph which I quoted—"It will be our duty to make it impossible."

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: That is, not England alone.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: It is open to the hon. Member to read the whole speech if he likes, and as far as I am concerned I hope he will do so. But, in the meantime, I ask the Irish Members seriously to consider the question—"Do they adopt that policy of their delegate, or do they repudiate it?" If they adopt it, then I say we shall look with suspicion at the accounts which may come to us in the autumn of the inability of the tenants to pay the rent.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Read the whole speech to us; we do not want a bit only.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: If the Irish Members repudiate the speech they must repudiate Mr. J. Redmond also, and they must likewise repudiate the money which is subscribed on the basis of this statement. Well, Sir, these are the main points which seem to me to be in favour of the contention that the judicial rents should not be disturbed. But there are very strong arguments on the other side. I do not think anyone will deny that there has been a great fall in the prices of almost all the chief produce of Ireland since the judicial rents were fixed. That fall may be variously estimated; but I, myself, should think that it represents from 20 to 30 per cent. Now, in case the judicial rents were fixed upon the basis of the prices at the time when they were fair rents, then they must necessarily be unfair rents now. On the other hand, it is alleged that the Commissioners took into account the possibility of a reduction. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] And I think it is probable that what the Commissioners did was to fix what I should call a fair average rent, having regard to ordinary fluctuations. But, Sir, that is not a sufficient answer. Is the present an ordinary fluctuation? Do you believe that the present fall is permanent, or only temporary? If it is a permanent fall, then, clearly, the rents are not fair, because unless you suppose the prices will be as much above as they have been below the average, the average will never be reached. Unless some day or other the prices will be much higher than I am afraid they are now below the average, the average will not be reached. If, on the contrary, you believe that such a fluctuation is likely in the future, and the present prices are temporary and exceptional, then I do not see why you should object to the principle of a sliding scale, which would give immediate relief to the tenant in time of need, and would give a prospect of future profit to the landlord. The conclusion I come to is this. I do not contend, in the face of insufficient information, that it would be possible to do what the hon. Gentleman suggests—namely, establish immediately a sliding scale throughout the whole of Ireland. It would be necessary to make careful inquiry before any arrangement of the kind could be carried out. But I do hope the Commission will give the matter careful consideration, and I, for one, should not be at all sorry if the suggestions of the hon. Member for Cork were finally adopted. At all events, I do not admit for a moment that there is any sanctity about judicial or any other rents. If rents cannot be paid so as to leave a fair subsistence to the tenants, there is no doubt the landlord must bear the loss. It is imputed to the Government that they have said that under no conceivable circumstances will they touch judicial rents, even if the Commission were to report in favour of reduction. But my own impression is quite different. I have not understood that the Government pledge themselves in such a way as to the future. It would be very unreasonable that they should do so. I am quite certain that if any Commission reported in the sense I have suggested, no Government would take the responsibility of maintaining judicial rents which the Commission reported, after full inquiry, to be too high. All I understand the Government to say is that in the meantime, pending inquiry, it is their business to maintain the authority of the law. If that is a crime, there are no greater criminals than those who sit on this Bench. The Governments of which I have been a Member have again and again expressed the same doctrine—my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), Lord Selborne, and the late Prime Minister himself, in reference to Ireland, and the circumstances connected with the Crofter movement, laid down the doctrine that, pending inquiry into an alteration of the law, it is the prime duty of every Government to maintain the law. Well, Sir, the hon. Member for Cork said—and this is a thing which made a great impression on the House—that evictions should go on, and that while these Commissioners were considering the crisis would arise, and that we should have difficulties upon us before we had considered how to remedy the evil. The hon. Member for Cork proposes, in order to deal with this state of things, that evictions should be stayed upon certain conditions which he laid down. I was rather surprised to find that he was supported in this contention by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle—

on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). My right hon. Friend has come to the conclusion, after carefully considering the question, that it would be wise to give to the Courts which are charged with the duty of issuing process for eviction some equitable jurisdiction to decide whether an eviction ought to take place or not. I am glad my right hon. Friend has come to that conclusion, and that the hon. Member for Cork has adopted it. But why did they not give me more encouragement when I proposed it in the month of April? In the month of April I proposed a plan of staying evictions—I do not say whether I was right or wrong—but I proposed that evictions should be stayed, and I had in my mind exactly the same idea as my right hon. Friend has put forward—namely, that it should be done by giving the Court some kind of equitable jurisdiction. I proposed at the same time something else to which very likely a greater objection would apply. In order to facilitate a proposal of that kind, I suggested that in the meantime to such landlords as might require it a portion of the rent due should be lent to them as a first charge on the land. That might have involved a loan of a million or two, or by extreme calculation it might have reached £4,000,000. I think it would have been as certain as Consols, as I only proposed that a portion equivalent to a fourth of the year's rent should be advanced, because I only proposed that a portion of the half-year's rent should be advanced. No one could say that would not be a safe security, and it was proposed in order to meet a difficulty. But that was not an essential part of the scheme. How did my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary receive that proposal? He described it as "the most extraordinary ever propounded by a man of my eminence and character." My right hon. Friend said I proposed first to pass an Act to stay evictions, which would not be passed in a hurry. That statement was received with loud cheers and laughter by the Home Rule Members. My right hon. Friend added that the Act I proposed was to remain in force for six months, and at the end of that time, if things were not quiet, another Act was to be passed. That was not my proposal, but it was attributed to me by my right hon. Friend. The landlords, meantime, he said, were to have their rents lent to them out of our money. Now, what I want to know is this—I think my right hon. Friend hit the blot in my proposal. I think the proposal was a just proposal. I am of the same opinion still. I wish the Government could have seen their way to treat the proposal for giving some equitable jurisdiction, so as to satisfy the people of England that if evictions took place they only occurred in the case of men who can pay and will not pay and are unwilling to pay, and not in the case of unfortunate men who are unable to pay. My right hon. Friend put his finger upon the blot in my proposal when he said that to pass legislation of that kind would be no slight difficulty in the present temper of the House. If the proposal were made what security was there that it would be accepted? I recollect what happened at the time of the Compensation for Disturbances Bill, when, in similar circumstances, a demand was made to us by the Irish Members to interrupt the course of Business in order to introduce a Bill dealing with a temporary difficulty. We consented, but what happened? Throughout the progress of that Bill we received from the Irish Members no assistance. There was continual obstruction and opposition, and at last they moved an Amendment against the third reading of the Bill. The Bill was introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). There was no gratitude for it although it was brought in in compliance with their demand. They rendered no assistance in passing it, and only made it a peg on which to hang continued and excessive discussion. I cannot help saying that, although I regret very much that the Government are not able to deal with this matter, I cannot blame them for it. In the face of such a precedent as that I cannot expect them to undertake complicated legislation of this kind, which would involve them and the House in protracted debates, which in the end might possibly, after all, prove entirely fruitless. Well, Sir, in conclusion, I venture to think that, at any rate, this controversy has brought the real issue clearly before the House. You have, on the one side, in reference to the whole of the Irish difficulty, those Irishmen and Englishmen whose object it is to establish a Statutory Parliament in Ireland, or, as some of them prefer, to make Ireland an independent country, and whose policy it is to make, in the meantime, the administration of affairs in Ireland by England impossible. I think that if any section of the Liberal Party shall be found permanently to commit itself to such an unpatriotic policy as that, it will suffer seriously in the opinion of the constituencies, and that it will wander for many years in the wilderness before it sees the promised land. On the other side, you have those who—to whatever Party they belong, or in whatever part of the House they may sit—believe in the supreme necessity of maintaining the effective Union between the Three Kingdoms, and who, with that object, are prepared to sustain the verdict of the constituencies. For my own part, I would say that if ever the people of this country should weary of the excessive burden of the mighty Empire that has been bequeathed to them by their ancestors, if they should ever be ready to acknowledge their incapacity to fulfil the obligations which attend upon such an inheritance, then I would rather a hundredfold that, instead of halting between two opinions, they should accept the logical sequence of the humiliating position, that they should yield wholly to their victors, that they should let Ireland go and become what the hon. Member for Cork once said he wished to make her—namely, independent among the nations of the world. Yes, Sir; but if the people of this country are not so craven in spirit, if they are not so willing to repudiate the obligations of a great nation, if they are not willing to betray those who have trusted to their good faith and honour, then I say that it is our duty—it is the duty of this Imperial Parliament—to recognize the position, and while, on the one hand, maintaining the cause of social order in that great contest between law and sheer lawlessness which was once so eloquently described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian in the speech he delivered at Leeds—while doing that, on the one hand, to endeavour, on the other, in every way to promote the material prosperity and the happiness of the people of Ireland, and to do for that people, as forming part of the United Kingdom, all or more than all that an Irish Parliament sitting in Dublin could reasonably and justly be expected to do. It is because I believe that the policy of the Government, as it has been shadowed forth to us, tends in this direction, and has these objects, that I am prepared to wait until it has been fully developed, and that, when it has been developed, I am prepared to give it a fair and a favourable consideration.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. Friend suffered some inconvenience, which I regret, from the interruptions which prevented him from delivering his speech before the dinner hour. I hope he considers that he has been more than recompensed by the cheers with which he has been greeted from the opposite side of the House. My right hon. Friend's speech seemed to me to be much less concerned with the Amendment which is before the House than full of endeavour to justify himself for his separation from the late Government, and for the course which he took—I believe one of some considerable importance in the weight of the support he gave to hon. Gentleman sitting on the opposite side of the House. But, Sir, I say, and I say it with all seriousness, that I doubt whether any hon. Member can recall any other speech made in such circumstances as the present that was so clearly marked by a tone of personal bitterness. It was a speech—I am sorry to say this, but I say it because I feel it—it was a speech in the course of which my right hon. Friend seemed to seek for and obtained the cheers of hon. Members opposite by language insulting—“Cries of ‘No!’ ‘Withdraw!’ and ‘Order!’—insulting to his former Colleagues and Friends sitting on this side of the House. I do not desire to say that my right hon. Friend intentionally pursued that course. It may be that he was betrayed into it by the intensity of personal feeling which possesses him, and it may also be that he has been sinned against himself in the same way in other places. But I think it is too much to expect forbearance from those who sit on this side of the House when my right hon. Friend selects a word to characterize the great bulk of the Liberal Party, to which Party he still professes to belong, which he must have known to be the most objectionable which he could have applied to them. [Interruption.] I shall feel obliged to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) if he will refrain from indulging in stage whispers. Sir, my right hon. Friend says that we are the party of Separatists. Hon. Members opposite may be entitled to say that. We have always regarded them as our political opponents, although we may not always have carried on our controversies with freedom from recrimination; but I want to know what right has a former Colleague and Friend of Gentlemen on this Bench, whose intentions and motives he must know, to dub that Party with a phrase which he knows to be considered by them insulting? Sir, we are not Separatists. We believe that you (pointing to the Ministerial Benches) and your allies are the Separatists; and so far as my right hon. Friend is concerned, if he were less assured of his own complete wisdom than he is, it might have given him some momentary doubt in that wisdom to note the fact that by three to one the Liberal Party in this House are opposed to him. But, Sir, my right hon. Friend did not stop at doing all he could to give pain to his former associates; he went further. With the zeal of a new convert he out-Heroded Herod, and he defended the policy of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite along the whole line. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Nay, more, he protested against being confined to that part of the defence of the policy of the Government which was ruled to be at all relevant to the Amendment. [Renewed Ministerial cheers.] I am glad to see that hon. Gentlemen opposite appreciate the position. My right hon. Friend betrayed an almost parental fondness for a particular part of that policy. He defended that policy with so much cordiality and so much tenderness as to make one suspect that his relationship to it was of the very closest and most intimate character. Now, Sir, as regards the Amendment before the House, my right hon. Friend said very little, but what he did say was very remarkable. He said that the Amendment was divided into two parts, to neither of which had he any objection in itself, but the Amendment was incomplete, and therefore he could not support it, for it led to no definite object; and then he went on to say, in very emphatic language, that he would support no Amendment, whatever that Amendment was, which would have the effect of displacing the Government opposite, and replacing it by a Government which he designated the Government of the Separatist Party. May I suggest respectfully to my right hon. Friend that he might have saved the House and himself some time, for his position is that he intends to vote for the Government and against any proposition which comes from this side of the House, however just and right and politic that proposition may be. My right hon. Friend might have declared his policy in a single sentence, and that is that he will vote against his Party and with the Party opposite. My right hon. Friend has condescended to submit to the House his views as to the issue of the late Elections. It would not be proper for me in that regard to follow him at any length, beyond saying this—that, looking at the difficulties with which this question of the government of Ireland is surrounded, the comparative suddenness, I must admit, with which the policy of the late Government was introduced, the amount of ignorance or want of knowledge which prevailed, the fruitful theme that it presented for misrepresentation, aye, and for appeals to prejudice of race and of religion, it is to me a marvel, not that that policy was for a time delayed—for I cannot say that it was defeated—but that so large a number of the political minds of England gave their adhesion to it. My right hon. Friend went on, in some little detail, to criticize the Amendment, and, as I am arguing upon the Amendment, let me recall the attention of the House to what it is. It consists, as has been said, of two parts, the first of which refers to and alleges a fall in the agricultural prices, and then it goes on to state that—

"The greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing wide-spread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order, will be the result."

I wish to ask permission to say a few words, and only a few words, on the closing paragraph, and I will endeavour, as far as I can, to avoid repeating what has been said by previous speakers. First of all, is that statement true? and, secondly, is it politic and right that the words should appear in the Address in the reply to the Speech from the Throne? Well, Sir, it is hardly denied that the statement is true. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] I hear one hon. Member say "No." I said it is "hardly" denied that the statement is true. That is proved first, so far as the authority of my right hon. Friend is concerned, by the admission of my right hon. Friend himself. But he did not carry his admission to the extent that he did in April last. In April last, in a speech to which he has referred, he stated that the fall in the prices of agricultural produce was from 20 to 40 per cent.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I said 20 to 30 per cent.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon if I am wrong; but I am not referring to my right hon. Friend's statement to-night. In April my right hon. Friend certainly spoke of a fall of 40 per cent. My right hon. Friend went further on that occasion, because he gave his own opinion, and he gave what seemed to me good reason, or, at all events, a strong reason, for that opinion—that the bottom had not, so to speak, been reached, and that a future fall might probably be expected; and he pointed to the insecurity of an arrangement based on the foundation of existing rents. Further, let me call the attention of hon. Members opposite to evidence from Ireland itself, and not evidence from the Southern and Western parts of the country only, or from hon. Members below the Gangway. I am sorry not to see the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) in his place; but I may state to the House that over the whole of Ulster there are associations for the protection of the rights of the tenants—not portions of the Land League, though I believe that, too, has its branches—and that these associations for the protection of the rights of the tenant farmers in Ulster—Presbyterian and Protestant tenant farmers principally—have passed resolutions declaring that the judicial rents are, in the circumstances of this time, excessive and impossible to pay. But I wish to point out one fact which, I think, has not been mentioned in this connection, but which seems to me to be very important to bear in mind, and it is this—the reductions that have been made by the judicial process in Ireland may be said to be about 17 to 18 per cent. Now, from what rents were those reductions made? I wish the House to note this fact. They were made from the rents fixed at the time when, by the admission of Parliament, the landlord and tenant were not able to deal on equal terms, and from rents fixed at the time when the landlords were claiming and were exercising the right of increasing the rents upon the tenants' avowed improvements; in other words, the rents which the Judicial Commission applied themselves to reconsider were rents based, in large measure at least, upon a comprehension and inclusion of the tenants' improvements. When you take that fact in mind, and take also the fact that in England voluntary reductions have been made to a much higher figure and to a very large extent, it will be apparent that reductions in England of 15 or 20 or 30 per cent upon the rents which the tenants paid, the landlords having at the same time to pay out of their own pockets yearly, or as occasion may arise, towards the maintenance and erection of farm buildings and other like improvements, it will be seen that reductions in England of 20 per cent will be equal to reductions in Ireland of 30, or above 30, per cent. That seems to me to be a consideration of some importance, especially when it is borne in mind—and I hope the House will forgive me for just dwelling upon this for one moment—that the Bessborough Commission found the fact to be that of the whole of the improvements which are made upon Irish agricultural land some 89 per cent are made by the tenants, and 11 per cent only by the landlords. Well, Sir, to return to the Amendment, can it be doubted that in circumstances such as these the judicial rents are too high? Can it be doubted that if the landlord insists upon his full pound of flesh the evictions which would follow upon that course would be a source of serious danger to the public peace? I think none of these things can be doubted. Then, is it politic that these facts should appear in the form suggested in the Amendment to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne? I think it is right and politic that they should, and I will tell the House why. It is not proposed by the Government to bring in a Bill of the nature which my right hon. Friend in April last suggested—I mean a Bill for the temporary staying of evictions throughout the country. I believe that was a generous and well-meant proposition on the part of my right hon. Friend, although I cannot forget that it was a bid made by my right hon. Friend in opposition to the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland and the Land Purchase Scheme of the late Government. I admit that there are great difficulties in the way of a general measure of that kind. If that be admitted, and if it be further admitted that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would have great difficulty in refusing the aid of the Executive in carrying out legal processes, except, indeed, in the very gravest extremity, in which he would be justified in coming to this House and asking for an indemnity for what he had done—if these two things be admitted, is it not right that in some form or other an expression of this, the representative House of Parliament, should go forth to Ireland, that in the circumstances of the present time the rights of the Irish landlords, according to the letter, should be exercised with moderation and with forbearance? Sir, I regard this Amendment very much as standing in the place of the appeal which Lord Carnarvon, to his credit, made to the Irish landlords in 1885. I consider it the more necessary, because of the language used by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) in unfolding the policy of the Government. I do not desire for one moment to have it suggested that by what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he wished to urge the Irish landlords to exact their extreme rights—I do not think he did—but I am speaking of the effect of what he said, and I do not doubt for one instant what the effect of what he said will be upon the minds of a great many Irish landlords. They will say—“Whatever the local opinion in Ireland is we regard it not; we look to the public opinion in England.” And if they find leading public opinion in England telling them that they are to be secured in their legal rights, and that England will stand by them with the full force of the Executive, the effect upon them must be to prevent them using that forbearance and that withholding of their full powers which otherwise they might exercise. Well, then, it is said that the law in Ireland is much more favourable to the tenant than the law is in England. The payment of rent has been treated by some hon. and learned Friends of mine as a strictly legal obligation. They say—“You must either pay the rent or go; you must either pay the rent, or let someone else come in to pay it. I do not know how it strikes hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I think if they dwell upon the question it will strike them as it strikes me, that in the mind of every man who considers the question of the rent of agricultural land there is a justifiable distinction to be drawn between an agricultural rent contract and other contracts. It is this—that at the bottom of the sentiment of the public mind there is a recurrence of that which is the true economic foundation for the payment of rent—namely, that the landlord is entitled, not to absolute payment in all events, but to a proportion of the produce of the land, the support of the man who tills the land being the first charge upon the land. That is the principle which hon. Members opposite know is the Common Law of Scotland to this day, which is the law in many parts of Europe to this day, and which, whether we wish it or not, has unquestionably affected the public mind in England, as shown by the transactions in relation to land in England, and the forbearance of landlords in England, who take into consideration, not whether the tenant is absolutely able to pay out of his own private resources, but whether the land is able to pay the rent. When I come to consider the policy suggested by the Government in relation to this matter I have great difficulty in appreciating it. And here let me say, with all sincerity, that I do not in the very least, by anything I am now saying, or by the support I am giving to this Amendment, desire to embarrass the Government on this occasion. I think, if the truth were spoken, the Government would perhaps recognize that in the free criticism which has proceeded from this side of the House upon the foreshadowing of their policy observations have been made which may be of considerable value to them. When the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), explaining in more detail the policy of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill), distinguished between judicial rents and non-judicial rents, I confess I did not follow the aim and object of the policy he propounded so far as any relief of the Irish tenantry was concerned. As regards judicial rents, there is to be an inquiry; but that inquiry is not to be with a view to the revision or remission of those judicial rents. In some way which I do not quite understand, and on which we have only an imperfect light shed by the statement attributed to the noble Marquess the Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury) in "another place," if it should turn out that the judicial rents have been fixed too high, whatever happens to the tenant the landlord is not to lose. This is the only clear idea I have of the policy of the Government. How this can be said to be any relief to the tenant, how it can be said to meet the case of exceptional fall in the price of agricultural produce, I entirely fail to see. Well, then, as regards rents which, for distinction, may be called non-judicial rents, fixed by ordinary agreement, the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary says there is a section in the Act of Parliament which enables the tenant to apply to the Court to stay. Has the right hon. Baronet inquired in how many cases that section was availed of? I think that if he consults the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) he will be told that in the case of those who most need protection, the small tenants, there has not been one application to the Court; that the applications under the staying section have been exceedingly few; and that in the cases in which applications have been made the Court, owing to the wording of the section, has often found itself unable to grant the prayer of the applicants. But, further, the practical answer is that the expense and delay involved have rendered the section of no avail as a means of protection to the tenant. Then my right hon. and learned Friend the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) certainly advanced a still more extraordinary argument. Pointing to the statement made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), that the important time of the year—a critical time it was called—would occur in November, my right hon. and learned Friend said—"Oh, that it quite a mistake," because no decree could be obtained for the November rent until the following January." Let me point out the entire misconception under which the right hon. and learned Gentleman labours. The arrears will be accumulating if the tenants cannot pay the rent, and the Act applies to the rent in arrear now, for which ejectment can be brought if one year's rent be in arrear. Then, it is said, the landlords in Ireland may be trusted to do what is right. I have never made an indiscriminate attack upon the Irish landlords; and I will only say of them that the legislation of this country—the legislation of 1870 and 1881, and the proceedings which followed upon it—have shown that, in the opinion of Parliament, the Irish landlords were not to be completely trusted. The fact is that in part they are the victims of a state of things which was not of their creation. They are suffering to-day for sins not of their committal. Many of them are impoverished themselves, and are unable to make concessions which men of larger means would make; but there is—upon which I lay great emphasis—there is an absence in Ireland of that strong local, searching, and thorough public opinion which is stronger than the law in England, and which controls the exercise of literal legal right. This public opinion is an important factor in social life in England; but, for reasons which I will not here dwell upon, it is wanting in Ireland. I now leave the first part of the Amendment, and I will say, with the permission of the House, only a word or two upon the second branch of it. That branch is one which deprecates any attempt to saddle any loss which may arise to the owners of land by the inability of the tenants to pay the present rent upon the taxpayers of Great Britain. I will take leave to say that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) did go out of his way—I will not say intentionally, but unnecessarily out of his way—in dealing with this Amendment to have a fling at the Purchase Scheme of the late Government; and in doing so I think I shall show the House, and even satisfy him that, in some important particulars, he has mis-stated what that scheme was. In the first place, what is this clause in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork? What relation has it in any way to any State-aided Purchase Scheme of the late Government? What is said here is this—and this is in reference to a statement attributed to the Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury) in “another place”—that if, after inquiry into the judicial rents, it should be found that the judicial rents are too high, then, where there are any remissions to the tenants, in the scheme of purchase by the State there shall be payment to the landlord upon the basis of the unjust rent. Now, will my right hon. Friend say that that is a sound proposition? He cannot. It would be utterly inconsistent not only with what he has said on previous occasions, but with his argument to-night, because it would be, in effect, compensating the landlord for the fictitious and untrue value put upon his property by excessive judicial rents. Well, but my right hon. Friend says, in reference to those rents—“Oh, the Commissioners were appointed, and I have no doubt they looked to the average.” There is no doubt they did look to the average; but then, if they looked to the average, it must have been to the average of what had gone before; it could not be the average of what was to follow, and that is explained very clearly by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mahony) sitting below the Gangway, who was formerly a Sub-Commissioner himself, and who said that what the practice had been was to take the average of five or six years preceding the fixing of the rent. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mahony) went on to show, by figures, that from the average of agricultural produce for those six years, contrasted with the present time and the two or three years which have succeeded the fixing of the judicial rents, there have been falls of from 20 to 42 per cent. Well, but my right hon. Friend mis-stated, as I conceive, the effect of the Land Purchase Scheme of the late Government. He seemed to think that the Land Scheme was necessarily based upon purchase at the judicial rent. My right hon. Friend will excuse me for saying that is not correct. It was not taken upon that basis absolutely. There was unquestionably what I may call a maximum of 30 years’ purchase upon the net rent, and there was a minimum so low that no mention was made of it—it might have been two, three, four, five, or six years’ purchase. I pass from that, and have one or two other words only to say. I am not going into a defence of the Purchase Scheme of the late Government. I never felt entirely in love with that scheme, and I have not expressed a very ardent affection for it here or elsewhere; but I did think—and I think still—that it was practically free from risk to the British taxpayer; and, even if it were not entirely so, I thought that, for the settlement of a great national, as well as a great social, question, it was worth making an effort, even if there should be appreciable risks to be borne by the English and Scotch and Welsh taxpayers. I think, further, that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) might have accepted the correction of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) upon the question of the margin of security. It was, no doubt, subject to prior charges, but it was practically the security of the whole Revenues of the country and of the whole land of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in introducing the Land Scheme of the late Government, said the land rents which the State authority would levy would amount to a net rental of £2,500,000; and he pointed out that there was the highest possible security for vigilance in levying the rents—firstly, in its sense of right; secondly, in its sense of prudence; and, thirdly, in its sense of necessity. In my opinion, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was justified in saying that after the prior charges had been defrayed there would be left a margin of somewhere about £2,000,000.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I think my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Charles Russell) did not understand what I said, and I am bound to say I did not understand the interruption of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton; but I think he will admit I apologized for any hasty expression of mine in reference to it. What I said was this—that the late Prime Minister said, and said truly, that the whole of the Revenues of Ireland were security for these rents; but then I pointed out that of those whole Revenues only the Customs and Excise were under the control of the Imperial Parliament, and it was only those to which I can refer as bearing the slightest security, and it was upon them I said it was a first mortgage which left only £200,000 value.

Sir Charles Russell

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: My right hon. Friend forgets that there was a provision in the scheme to the effect that so long as indebtedness to the British Treasury continued, all the payments were to go through the hands of an Imperial authority—namely, the Receiver-General. Allow me to say in this connection that the great merit of that scheme—a merit which I think will be more recognized hereafter than now—was that so far from following the precedent of previous land schemes in dealings between the English Executive, representing the British Treasury on the one hand, and individual tenants and individual landlords on the other hand, for the first time it created a central Local Authority which was, if I may use the expression, a buffer between the landlord and tenant on the one hand, and the British Executive on the other—a Central Authority which for the justification of its own existence, not to say of its credit in the face of the world, was placed in a position in which it was bound to exert, and must exert, on the local public opinion in Ireland the strongest moral pressure for the fulfilment of the obligations under it. But we are not discussing that measure, and I will just make this concluding comment upon the general outline of policy sketched by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have never thought—I do not think it now—fair to attempt to pin the Government to the details of a policy which has only been sketched. I think the noble Lord who leads this House probably is himself to blame for his indiscretion—if it is indiscretion—in inviting criticism by the statement of policy which enlarged and amplified the Queen's Speech. Certainly, this policy of the Government is marked by one extraordinary feature. I do not say that this feature is one which is peculiar to the present Government, for I am afraid it is to be found in the policy of many preceding Governments. We are here dealing with a system of government by representation which we all prize; and yet in the case of Ireland you are inaugurating a policy which, so far as you have sketched it, has not received the approval of a single Representative from Ireland—of those who represent the great majority of the Irish people. Your policy has not been approved by any one of the Representatives of four-fifths of the Irish people—nay more, in your search for information, in your wide field of Commissions, I have not heard it said that you have made arrangements, or contemplate arrangements, for the representation of the Irish Members upon those Commissions. No; you are following the old and fatal policy of fashioning for yourselves a policy for Ireland. You are giving Ireland what you in your wisdom think she ought to take, and not consulting those who ought best to know her wants and wishes. Well, Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) said—"Why should my Friends on this side of the House be impatient for the policy of the Government; why should they not wait? If the policy which they maintain and contend for—namely, the policy of the right of the Irish people to govern themselves—be just and true, that policy must and will prevail." We agree with the noble Lord. We believe our policy to be just and true. We believe it will prevail. We believe that the mists and clouds of prejudice will be soon dispelled; and I, for one, believe that the day is not very far distant when we shall be looking back upon the settlement of this question with amazement—amazement that we should have given way to such dire forebodings, just as you look back with amazement at the forebodings of your Predecessors when any great Constitutional change has been effected. I will say this only in conclusion. My right hon. Friend, in his peroration, spoke of the day—the dismal day, I think he called it—of humiliation, when a craven policy of despair will have taken possession of the minds of British statesmen, and when the Irish demands will be yielded under that feeling of despair. Despair of what? I hope it may be a policy of despair indeed, but a policy of despair of the old methods; a policy of despair of the methods by which you have set at naught and disregarded the great popular will and the great popular wish; despair of a policy by which you have thrust your rule on the people by force and fear; not a policy by which you have sought to win the Irish people to the side of law, and by which you might rule them through affection. And how are you to do that best? By carrying out that which I maintain to be, notwithstanding what my right hon. Friend may now say and think, a true Liberal principle, respecting the wishes and wants of those over whom you rule. When my right hon. Friend talks of humiliation, I ask if it would have been a humiliation had the Advisers of George III. recognized the rights of the Colonies of America to govern themselves? Was it a humiliation to give to the Canadians the right to rule themselves? No, Sir; there is no humiliation in doing justice; and when a demand is made, as this demand is made, in a spirit of friendly feeling with England, in a spirit in which it is hoped that bygones may be bygones, and that the ill-treatment of years may be forgotten, is not the statesmanship of England, is not the spirit of public men on both sides, equal to the task of devising a policy by which the Irish people may be permitted to govern themselves—a policy which would not imperil, but would give added strength and dignity to the Empire?

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 —(Mr. Sexton.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I am bound to say that I feel in a difficult position as regards this Motion. I would be most anxious myself to avoid even the commencement of anything like a wrangling controversy with any Party in this House on Motions for Adjournment; but I feel bound to remind the House of the leading facts of the case. The Amendment was moved on Tuesday, and I think I shall not be contradicted when I say that all Parties in this House have very fully laid their views with regard to it before the House; and, of all Parties, I do not think that the Irish Party can say that their views have not been fully placed before us. But what the Government feel strongly is this—having regard to the period of the year at which we have arrived, and the very large amount of Public Business which still remains before the House, and which it is indispensable that the House should get through, they would be very reluctant to consent to any further prolongation of the debate, unless, either by appealing to the right hon. Gentleman who leads the Opposition, or to any hon. Gentleman below the Gangway who is able to speak with authority as to the intentions of those who follow the hon. Member for the City of Cork—unless we can get from one or other of those Gentlemen a clear and honourable undertaking that if the Government do not resist the Motion for Adjournment they may count on the debate on the present Amendment terminating to-morrow evening. Without that undertaking I must ask the House to continue.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): The noble Lord has said truly that the debate on the Address has extended to a considerable length, although I think not to a greater length than has been the case in former years. But the noble Lord must not blame the House for that. I am not going to say anything against the course taken, which, no doubt, has been taken for reasons which appeared to them sufficient; but it was open to them to have said—"Parliament meets in February next, and we intend to reserve till then any statement as to our policy." That course they did not take, and I have no doubt they had good reasons for not taking it. But a noble Lord in "another place" stated in very definite outline the whole policy affecting Ireland, both in the present and in the immediate future. Under the circumstances, then, it was almost inevitable that the character of that policy should have led to a very extensive debate. Certainly, however, so far as I, and I believe most hon. Members on this side of the House are concerned, there will be every desire to confine the debate within reasonable limits. I think the proposal of the noble Lord's a fair one, and that it should be accepted—namely, that the debate on this Amendment should be brought to a termination to-morrow night.

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S., and Belfast, W.): There is no one below the Gangway competent to pledge the Leader of this Party in his absence. But, for my own part, I think the proposal of the noble Lord a fair one, and, with the consent of my Colleagues, am willing to agree to it.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to state that it is not alone the Representatives of Irish constituencies who are concerned in this question. There is a considerable number of Radical Members who have not yet been able to express their views upon the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

SHOP HOURS REGULATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Lubbock, Bill to regulate the Hours of Labour in Shops, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Barry, Mr. Burt, Mr. Cameron Corbett, and Mr. Macnaghten.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 40.]

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Committee appointed, "to control the arrangements of the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the department of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House:"—Committee to consist of Sixteen Members:—Mr. A. H. ACLAND, Mr. AGGARDNER, Mr. BIGGAN, Mr. WILLIAM CORNETT, Baron DUNSDALE, Mr. FENWICK, Mr. FLOWER, General GOLDSWORTHY, Mr. HERBERT, Viscount LEWISHAM, Mr. LONG, Mr. MANJONIBANKS, Mr. RICHARD POWELL, Baron de ROTHSCHILD, Mr. SHEIL, and Mr. YERSCUGH nominated Members of the Committee: Five to be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 27th August, 1836.

MINUTES.]—New Member Sworn—Alexander Weston Jarvis, esquire, for the Borough of King's Lynn.

PARLIAMENT—STANDING ORDERS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Standing Orders do consist of Twelve Members.

Ordered, That Sir EDWARD BIRKBECK, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH be added to the Committee.

Ordered, That so much of Standing Order No. 91 as fixes Five as the quorum of the Select Committee on Standing Orders be read, and suspended.

Ordered, That, for the remainder of the Session, Three be the quorum of the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray).

ARMY—CHARGES AGAINST THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN: I was not in the House last night when the Secretary of State for War made the statement that—

"It is the rule of the Ordnance Department to require any officers on entering it to cease to retain any interest in any manufacturing firm which may be, or are likely to be, War Office contractors."

but as the right hon. Gentleman has made that statement, I beg to give Notice that I shall withdraw the Motion with reference to the Ordnance Department which now stands in my name.

QUESTIONS.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACT, 1836—

"THE TITHE WAR IN WALES."

MR. J. G. HUBBARD (London) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the statements contained in an article in the Daily News of the 23rd August, headed "The Tithe War in Wales," are founded on fact; whether tithe rent-charge is a legal primary charge upon lands, subject to no other variation than that provided by the Commutation Act of 1836; whether he can state the per-centage of the original commutation now payable under the heavy fall of prices on the septennial average; whether the demand of a further abatement from the tithe of 25 per cent. in the parish of Llanarmon was accompanied by threats; and, whether he will therefore move the proper authorities to take the necessary measures for protecting the clergy from annoyance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I am informed that the article to which my right hon. Friend refers is founded on fact, and that the statements therein are true. Tithe rent-charge, subject only to the variation provided by the Act of 1836, is a legal charge upon lands. I am informed by the Land Commissioners that the amount payable on the septennial average for the year 1886 in respect of each £100 of tithe rent-charge as commuted is something over £90, or about 9½ per cent reduction from the original commutation. The duty of maintaining order rests upon the Local Authorities; if the clergy require protection I have no doubt it will be afforded to them.

ARMY—CANTEENS.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can inform the House in how many cases Committees managing canteens in the Army throw open the supplies for these canteens to public competition, as recommended by his immediate predecessor in the office of Secretary for War, in replies to Questions put to that Right honourable Gentleman in the last Parliament; and, whether he will take any measures to encourage the adoption of the system generally?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Reports, which were specially called for, show that nearly all the principal canteens obtain their chief supplies either locally or from private firms; but I have no information as to public competition. My Predecessor certainly expressed an opinion in favour of that system; but he, at the same time, stated explicitly that he did not think it desirable that the management of canteens should be interfered with by any directions on the subject. I agree with that view.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— ATTEMPTED DISTURBANCE AT GILFORD, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If by direction of Captain O'Brien, J.P., an Orange drumming party, principally from Tanderagee, paid a visit to Gilford, and made every effort to create a riot; but, failing in their endeavour, attacked a young married woman named Bridget Conlon, kicked and beat her in the most savage manner; whether any arrests were made; and, what steps were taken to bring the perpetrators to justice?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he was informed that the band reached Gilford on the 7th instant, but nothing was known as to Captain O'Brien having sent it. A woman was assaulted, but not seriously. A man named Davidson was arrested for the assault. The case was heard at the Petty Sessions, and dismissed. As the woman took proceedings the police did not interfere.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. GRAY, OF GLENANN, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Gray, of Glenann, county Armagh, some time ago made a composition with his creditors; and, if so, will he be further retained in the commission of the peace and ex-officio guardianship of the poor?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, the records of the Court of Bankruptcy for several years had been searched and no trace had been found of any record in support of the allegation in the Question. He believed there were two Mr. Grays in the Commission of the Peace at Armagh; but nothing of the kind had been found in reference to either of them.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. SINCLAIR, NEWRY.

MR. ALEXANDER BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Sinclair, of Newry, some time ago made a composition with his creditors; and, if so, will he still be retained in the commission of the peace, guardianship of the poor, and Newry Town Commission?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, that the fact was as stated with regard to Mr. Sinclair. Accordingly a communication, as was usual in such cases, had been addressed to him.

WEST INDIA ISLANDS—DOMINICA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the colonists of Dominica recently voted for annexation to the United States of America; and, if so, for what reasons; whether the Home Government offered loans to the colonists of Demerara, within the last three years, to carry on their plantations; what was the rate of interest on those loans, and when were they to be repaid; whether the offer of the Home Government was accepted by the colonists; and, if not, for what reasons; whether it is true that all, or nearly all, the lucrative Government posts in the West Indian Colonies are filled by others than colonists; whether the colonists are satisfied with this arrangement; and, if it is a fact that the colonists have to teach many of the officials how to perform their work, besides providing their salaries by taxation?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In answer to the first Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that a Resolution in favour of annexation to the United States was proposed in the Legislative Assembly of Dominica in 1881, but was rejected. To the second, third, and fourth Questions the answer is in the negative. To the fifth and sixth Questions I may say that it is necessary to fill some of the higher offices in these Colonies by the appointment of persons from the United Kingdom or from other Colonies; but many lucrative offices are held by persons belonging to the Colony, and there is no reason to believe that any general dissatisfaction exists on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ENNISKILLEN MAGISTRATES — "THE QUEEN v. JAMES PHAIR."

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the observations of Mr. Justice Murphy, in the case of the Queen v. James Phair, at the last Enniskillen Assizes, reported in The Freeman's Journal of the 8th July last, in the following terms:—

"James Phair was put forward and charged with committing a serious assault on one John M'Manus, at Lisnakea, on the 5th December:

"The case was of a party nature, Phair being a Protestant and M'Manus a Roman Catholic:

"His Lordship commented severely on the conduct of the magistrates at petty sessions, who entered 'no rule' in the case of two other defendants named Moore and Rowe, who were finally charged along with Phair, simply because there was a conflict of evidence as to the identity of the persons charged. His Lordship held that such cases should be returned for trial, and left for a jury, and that it was a monstrous thing for a magistrate to enter 'no rule' under the circumstances; "

who the magistrates are referred to by his Lordship; and, whether the Lord Chancellor proposes to take any action in regard to their conduct?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has asked me to answer this Question. I am informed by the Resident Magistrate that the observations attributed to Mr. Justice Murphy are substantially correct. The magistrates referred to were Captain M'Ternan and Messrs. Trench, Creighton, Winslow, Johnston, and Westrop, who seem to have been unanimous in entering "no rule" in the case of Moore and Rowe. I do not gather from the Judge's observations that he attributed anything more to the magistrates than an error of judgment; and if that be so it would hardly be a case for action on the part of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Captain M'Ternan is a Resident Magistrate of experience.

NAVY—THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he can inform the House the names, number of guns, and men (Blue Jackets and Marines, comprising the Mediterranean Squadron, and in what manœuvres and tactics ships and men have been engaged since His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh assumed the command; whether any special arrangements exist for educating the crews in gunnery and torpedo games of war outside smooth water; and, if it is with the consent of the Admiralty that the ships are being utilized for yachting trips in the neighbourhood of Egypt and the Holy Land?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It would only weary the House to read out all the information asked for by the hon. Member. The number of officers and men in the Mediterranean Squadron is 5,197. The Navy List gives the names of the various ships with the numbers of their guns. The ships and men have been engaged in such manœuvres and tactics and other service that has been considered necessary to secure efficiency; and there is no reason to doubt that the Duke of Edinburgh will, in these tactics and exercises, keep his men up to that high state of efficiency characterizing his previous commands. All necessary arrangements exist for training the crews in gunnery and torpedo work at sea. The ships of the Mediterranean Squadron are not being utilized for yachting trips in the neighbourhood of Egypt and the Holy Land, but are employed in carrying out the programme approved by the late Board of Admiralty for their autumn cruise.

JAPAN—CONCESSIONS TO GERMAN TRADERS.

MR. BROOKE ROBINSON (Dudley) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to an alleged Convention between the Government of Japan and certain German Traders, giving to Germany the entire monopoly for a period of eight years of supplying all steel rails required for Japan?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No such information has been received by Her Majesty's Government.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—LIMERICK POST OFFICE—SALARIES OF THE LETTER CARRIERS AND CLERKS.

MR. HENRY GILL (Limerick) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the maximum salary of the letter-carriers of the post office of Limerick, which is now ranked as a first-class office, is only twenty-two shillings a week, whilst that of the letter-carriers of Dublin, Belfast, &c. is thirty shillings a week; whether the duration of work is in the aggregate the same as in Limerick; whether, up to the year 1882, the salary of the sorting clerks in Limerick was only four shillings a week in advance of that of the letter-carriers, whilst now it is sixteen shillings a week in advance; whether in Limerick there are only four first-class positions amongst thirty-seven clerks in the telegraph branch, whilst in the post office branch there are nine first-class positions amongst fifteen clerks; and, if these discrepancies exist, will steps be soon taken to remedy them by raising the salaries of the letter-carriers to the same scale as in other first-class offices, and increasing the number of first-class appointments in the telegraph service?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member I find that the wages granted to postmen in Limerick are the same as those given at Plymouth, Bath, Paisley, and other towns, and that they were raised in 1882 to the present amount—namely, 18s., rising by 1s. to 22s. a-week. They are amply sufficient, and it is not intended to increase them further. The circumstances of the other towns referred to in the Question are different. The wages of the sorting clerks in Limerick were raised in 1881, because they were considered not sufficient for the duties performed. As regards the superior positions referred to, I have to inform the hon. Member that the number of superior appointments must be determined by the number of superior duties to be discharged, and that from time to time, as business increases, it becomes necessary to adjust the number of the higher appointments. Various alterations, consequent on the increased business arising out of the reduced rates for telegrams, are now under consideration; and it is probable that the numbers of the classes at the Limerick office will have to be examined from this point of view.

MR. HENRY GILL asked for an explanation as to the discrepancy between the letter-carriers and the sorters.

MR. RAIKES said, his answer only applied to the letter-carriers, whose wages it did not seem to him necessary to increase. He was not responsible for the increase in the case of the sorters, which had been made in 1881, for reasons which had been approved of by the late Mr. Fawcett.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACT, 1836—DISTRIN FOR TITHE—LLANARMON PARISH.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the farmers of Llanarmon and similar upland parishes in Wales are suffering most heavily from a fall of nearly fifty per cent. in the price of cattle and dairy produce; whether, out of a population of 1,681 in the parish of Llanarmon, only forty or fifty attend the ministrations of the tithe-receiver; and, whether he will take the necessary measures for protecting these hill farmers, who support their own form of religious worship, from the annoyance of peremptory distraint for tithe.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): In reply to the hon. Member I have to say that I have no information at the Home Office which would show me that agricultural depression is more severely felt in Wales than in other parts of the United Kingdom, and I have no means of ascertaining what percentage of the population of Llanarmon attend the ministrations of the tithe receiver. I have further to say that I have neither the intention nor the power to interfere with the ordinary process by which legal claims to tithe are enforced.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT— MANUFACTURE OF MATERIALS OF WAR.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, What are the materials of war which Her Majesty's Government cannot obtain in this Country; if the ordinary demand for them in the future is likely to be sufficient to justify the erection of factories and machinery for their manufacture; and, further, if, in the contracts which at present are unavoidably placed with foreigners, any condition is or will be imposed as to the employment of British labour?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL Mr. NORTHMORE (Exeter): A list of the materials referred to will be found in a Return (No. 228 of June 24 last) obtained by the hon. Member for North Sligo Mr. P. McDonald). The principal items of the Return are gunpowder, Hotchkiss machine guns, swords, and compressed meat. As regards the first item, we have had hitherto to buy a particular kind of powder, known as cocoa powder, from German firms, who have now patented the article. Our contract with them expires March 31, 1887. Some English firms are endeavouring to produce this powder, and if they succeed we shall in future be in a position to deal with them as occasion offers. One of the German firms has already established a factory in England.

As regards the Hotchkiss machine guns, arrangements have been made for their manufacture hereafter in this country. As regards swords, there is practically only one English firm that now manufactures them. They have a large contract on hand at present, as a new Cavalry sword has been approved, and is being manufactured; but the ordinary demand for swords is so small that the trade have nearly abandoned it in England. As respects compressed meat, we have to buy a large quantity of corned beef at Chicago; but we took, at the same time, all we could from Australia. The English compressed corn beef is much more costly than the American, the price of the raw material being so much higher. I hope the trade will develop in our Colonies. The answer to the last paragraph is in the negative; but I hope that the facts that a powder factory has been established in England and that the Hotchkiss gun will be henceforth made in this country will increase the demand for English labour.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT WITH CREDITORS—LEGISLATION.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If Her Majesty's Government will introduce, as soon as practicable, a Bill by which Deeds of Arrangement with Creditors may, by registration or otherwise, be made public, and traders be protected from dealing with insolvent persons?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD Baron HENRY DE WORMS (Liverpool, East Toxteth): It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to undertake any general legislation during the present Session; and I am unable to hold out any promise to the hon. Member as to the future.

THE MAURITIUS—SIR JOHN POPE HENNESSY AND MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the differences between Sir J. Pope Hennessy and Mr. Clifford Lloyd, offer the first instance of difficulties between Sir J. Pope Hennessy and those under his orders; and, if not, in how many Colonies Sir J. Pope Hennessy has experienced similar difficulties?

MR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, before the Question was answered he wished to ask whether a majority of Representatives in the Council of the Island had not passed a vote of confidence in Sir John Pope Hennessy; whether the origination of the unfortunate state of affairs was simultaneous with the advent of Mr. Clifford Lloyd; and whether, considering the trouble which had always been brought about by Mr. Clifford Lloyd wherever he went, the Government would cancel his present appointment to the Seychelles Islands, and transfer him to a more isolated and secluded portion of Her Majesty's Dominions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANNOP) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In reply to the last part of the Question of the hon. Member my answer is a negative, and as regards the first part he will, perhaps, give me Notice of it. As regards the Question of the hon. Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid), I have to say that this subject is one which cannot be fairly dealt with within the limits of a reply to a Question. Therefore, in justice to all parties I must ask the leave of the House to refrain from answering it.

INDIA—THE DEPRECIATION OF SILVER.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he intends to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence with the Indian Government on the subject of the depreciation of silver?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: The Correspondence is in type, and will be presented immediately.

NAVY—ARMOUR-PIERCING BREECH-LOADING GUNS.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLET (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, inasmuch as the Edinburgh, Conqueror, and Impérieuse are not, and never have been, in commission, there are no heavy armour-piercing breech-loading guns afloat, otherwise than in dock, except those of the Celestus, which the captain has been ordered not to fire?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): There are no heavy breech-loading guns afloat capable of piercing 20 inches of armour at 2,000 yards in ships in commission, except those in the Celestus.

Dr. Tanner

METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD—SMALL-POX HOSPITAL AT DARENTH.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) who had given Notice to ask the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has received protests from several Metropolitan Boards of Guardians against the proposal of the Metropolitan Asylums Board to erect a permanent small-pox hospital at Gore Farm, Darent, at an estimated cost to the ratepayers of £116,000, which is, in the opinion of the Guardians, an unnecessary and extravagant expenditure; whether he is aware that it is proposed to hold a Conference of the Metropolitan Guardians, at an early date, to consider the question; and, whether he will withhold the assent of the Local Government Board to the proposed expenditure, at all events until this Conference has been held? said, he had now been informed that the Local Government Board had refused its assent. He wished to know if that was correct?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Yes, Sir; quite correct.

THE MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES) — THE SOMERSET MAGISTRACY.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it be true that the miners of Somerset petitioned the late Lord Chancellor to commission Mr. R. Harty Dunn as a working man magistrate for the county, and whether Lord Herschell refused to commission and Lord Cork to nominate him on the ground that he is not possessed of the property qualification fixed by Law; and, whether the Government will bring in a Bill to abolish or amend the Law relating to the property qualification of county magistrates, so that, as in municipal boroughs, representative working men may be put on the Commission of the Peace?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have inquired at the Lord Chancellor's Office and at the Crown Office, and am informed that nothing is known there of the petition of the Somerset miners, or of any papers showing what the action of Lord Herschell and Lord Cork may have been. I am unable to make any statement as to the intentions of the Government with regard to any amendment of the existing law as to the property qualification of county magistrates.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF THE WALKERS (BELFAST).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is intended to prefer a bill of indictment against the two men Walker charged with the murder of Head Constable Gardiner at the coming winter assizes; whether it is the fact that, in the case arising out of the recent disturbance in York Street, Dublin, the Crown considered that the Orangeman charged with shooting at a Nationalist crowd would not receive a fair trial at the hands of a jury of the city of Dublin, and accordingly had the trial in the adjoining county, by a jury, eleven of whom were Protestants; whether it is the fact that in recent years the Crown, in a Kilkenny murder case (Queen v. Phelan), and in other criminal cases of an agrarian character, had the indictment transferred into the Queen's Bench, and the accused tried by Dublin special juries; whether, if the trial of the Walkers proceeds in Belfast, there is any probability (having regard to the prisoners' right of challenge) that a jury can be had which will not be to a considerable extent composed of Orangemen in sympathy with the accused; and, whether, under the circumstances, he considers the case is one in which the Queen's Bench should be moved by the Crown to change the venue?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I fear I can give no answer beyond that given yesterday regarding the trial of the Walkers. No step to change the venue could be taken, nor could I give any effective directions as to the Winter Assizes until November; and I cannot now determine as to a course of action which must be largely dependent upon future circumstances. The Crown did not consider that the accused in the York Street shooting case would not receive a fair trial by a City of Dublin jury. He was tried in the county pursuant to a suggestion of the Court made on the occasion of an application on behalf of the prisoner for a writ of certiorari; but though this suggestion was made I have no reason to think that it arose from a distrust of city jurors. The murder case referred to and other country criminal cases were tried in Dublin. The venue was changed in most of these cases under the provisions of a Statute that has now expired.

IRELAND (SOUTH-WESTERN DISTRICT)—SIR REDVERS BULLER.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether General Sir Redvers Buller retains his appointment as Deputy Adjutant General, or continues to hold any military office or to draw any pay for such office?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: As this Question specially concerns the War Office, perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer it. Sir Redvers Buller does not retain his appointment as Deputy Adjutant General; Major General Sir Edward Bulwer has already taken his place, and his appointment will be gazetted forthwith. Sir Redvers Buller does not continue to hold any military office, or to draw any pay for such office.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) inquired whether Sir Redvers Buller would be in military command of the troops in his district?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The officer commanding the district will take command of the troops. Prince Edward is in command of the troops in Ireland, and a General in Cork has, I believe, command of the troops in the district.

MR. JAMES STUART said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the additional part of his Question, as to whether Sir Redvers Buller was to be accompanied by a Staff; and what was the character of the force to be placed at his disposal?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I did not answer the Question because I thought the right hon. Gentleman was answered fully yesterday. After having received the assurances of right hon. Gentlemen on this Bench that Sir Redvers Buller holds a civil appointment only, I should have thought the hon. Member could hardly be in earnest in asking whether he has a Staff. He has gone to Ireland with a Secretary—a gentleman who was Secretary to the late Lord Lieutenant (the Earl of Aberdeen)—and that constitutes his Staff.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question of which I have given him private Notice—Whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph in this morning's Times to the effect that Sir Redvers Buller was throughout yesterday engaged at the War Office with the heads of Departments arranging for the necessary force to carry out the intentions of the Government; whether Sir Redvers Buller stated to a correspondent of that paper at Euston Station that his Staff was not to be a large one; and whether he has been accompanied by a Military Secretary? I should like to know whether these statements are correct?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: My right hon. Friend is asked what occurred at the War Office. He is not able to say; but it may interest him and the House to know that Sir Redvers Buller was at the War Office yesterday for precisely five minutes, taking leave of some of his friends on leaving for Ireland, and nothing of the kind which has been referred to took place. Once again I ask right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen to believe that when statements are made from this Bench they are made in good faith; and if apocryphal statements appear in newspapers they ought not to cause the anxiety which hon. Gentlemen seem to feel.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE — SECRET SERVICE MONEY.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Government have come to any decision upon the Report of the Public Accounts Committee of the last Session, with regard to the sum of £10,000 appropriated from the Consolidated Fund for Secret Service; and, whether they will consider the practicability of limiting the Secret Service money to annual amounts voted in Supply?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): Perhaps the House will allow me to answer this Question. I am quite aware that the hon. Member has taken a good deal of interest in this question, both in the House and on the Committee of Public Accounts, and I hope that the answer I shall give will prove satisfactory to him and the House generally. Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered the question of Secret Service money, which is appropriated out of the Consolidated Fund by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury; and the Government have decided that it would be for the advantage of the Public Service if they introduced a Bill without delay to repeal the Act 22 Geo. III. c. 82, or part of that Act and part of 1 & 2 Viet. c. 2, under the provisions of which Acts £10,000 is appropriated from the Consolidated Fund as Secret Service money to be used by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury. That Bill will be introduced by the Secretary to the Treasury, and will take effect from the day it is passed. It will, however, be necessary for the Government to present an Estimate to the House providing for the expenditure of the Government in connection with Ministerial work performed in both Houses of Parliament. That Estimate will be small and moderate, providing for a small staff of messengers and clerks. The expenses I am now alluding to will be presented and voted in Parliament in the usual way, and will consist of items which have been defrayed hitherto out of funds at the disposal of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury. I hope that the House will consider the decision of the Government a reasonable one, having regard to the official Report, and that it constitutes a beneficial reform. I may be allowed to add that any credit in the matter will be due to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), who, from the day he came into Office last June, took great interest in this question and has greatly contributed to the course taken by the Government in the matter, and, by measures which he induced the Treasury to adopt, anticipated the Minute of the Public Accounts Committee to which the hon. Member refers.

NAVY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT— THE 43-TON GUNS.

COLONEL HUGHES - HALLETT (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, with reference to the statement made by a late First Lord of the Admiralty on 7th May last, that the "strengthening," or supposed strengthening, of the 43-ton guns already in the Service would

i.e. on or about 7th June, the work was finished in that time; and, if not, when it was or will be finished; and, whether any of these guns so "strengthened" have been fired since the operation was carried out; and, if so, with what result?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Since the statement of May 7, made by the late First Lord of the Admiralty, it has been decided to substitute for the 43-ton guns that it had been originally intended to strengthen, newer guns of an improved pattern, which were constructed for land service. Some alterations were necessary to adapt the newer pattern for the Naval Service; but it is expected that six of these guns will be mounted in the Colossus and Conqueror by the middle of October. None of the 43-ton guns that were landed from the ships have been strengthened or fired that I am aware of.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—LORD CLANRICARDE'S WOODFORD ESTATE.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Lord Clanricarde is meeting the tenantry on his Woodford Estate, county Galway, and that, in connection with these evictions, twenty-seven people have been arrested and imprisoned in Galway Gaol; whether it be true that, as stated in The Times newspaper of the 26th inst., battering rams are to be brought from Dublin in order, the more expeditiously, to level the houses of the tenantry; and, whether it is within the knowledge of the Government that the tenants on the Woodford Estate, and their predecessors in title, have built the houses and reclaimed the land from which they are in the course of being evicted; and, if so, will the Government interfere to prevent these evictions?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BAUGH) (Bristol, W.) was understood to say that he was unable to answer the last two paragraphs of the Question, as it only appeared in the Notice Paper that morning. But he might state that evictions were taking place on the estate of Lord Clanricarde at Woodford, and that the Sheriff's officers had been met with the most determined and organized resistance. Walls had been put up, and violent attacks were made on them with boiling water and knives. Some arrests had been made.

BULGARIA—ATTEMPTED REVOLUTION—PRINCE ALEXANDER.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether he had any information as to the present whereabouts of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I am sorry I am not able to inform my hon. Friend and the House where Prince Alexander is. All I can tell the House is that the Acting Minister at Bucharest telegraphs that the Prince had left Reni at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, and might arrive at Lemberg, in Galicia, last night or this morning. We have not heard of his arrival there.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [19th August]—[See page 96.]

And which Amendment was,

At the end of the last paragraph, to add the words—"And humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fear that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and many will be unable to pay these rents. That numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing widespread suffering and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

Debate resumed.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S.): It cannot be denied, I think, that the Government, with regard to this Amendment, as well as in a general sense, occupies at this moment a position of great advantage; for whilst they enjoy the dignity and the emoluments of the Government, they are relieved, by the energy of casual allies on the other side of the Table, from the trouble either of framing a policy in the Cabinet, or of defending it in detail. I have to note, at the outset, the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who has afforded, I think, to the House and the country a questionable example of British pluck by making his case and showing his confidence in it by running away from the reply. The right hon. Gentleman referred, last night, to the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone); but I think, Sir, considering that the Tory Party have not only taken possession of the old establishment of the late Prime Minister, but placed a couple of bailiffs on the new premises, it is not wonderful that the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister should have decided on a change of scene. I feel it necessary to explain that I am gravely misrepresented to-day in the Press, as having endeavoured to procure a restriction, from the view of Order, upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in the course of his speech last night. In reality, my object, Sir, as you will remember, was to remove the restriction, if possible, and to allow the right hon. Gentleman the utmost scope for his argument. The more he said the better I liked it; for I regard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham as a political misdoer, who only needs to be given sufficient material to execute the ends of public justice upon himself. The right hon. Gentleman condemned the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) as being vague and inconclusive, and he did that in a speech the only reasonable conclusion of which was contrary to his action. But out of the same speech you may draw half-a-dozen contending and conflicting conclusions, according to the passage to which, at the moment, your attention may be drawn. The Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork, so far from being vague and inconclusive, is definite and unmistakably clear. He says, in the first place, that he regards the prospect of the winter in Ireland with fear. There is nothing vague about fear. Fear, I think, is the strongest passion of human nature, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is, perhaps, beginning to understand; for if the Amendment were adopted the Prime Minister would be compelled to withdraw or modify his policy, or else to resign Office. My hon. Friend the Member for Cork fears that, owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and that they will be unable to pay those rents. He further says that—

“Numerous evictions confiscating the rights vested in the tenants by the Land Act of 1881, causing wide-spread suffering, and endangering the maintenance of social order will be the result. That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the tax-payers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are.”

That is the Amendment, clear, definite, dealing with the declared policy of the Government, addressing itself to the present condition of affairs, and warning the Government and the House of an imminent risk that stands immediately before it. That is the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham describes as an abstract proposition. He says it is not the practice of the House to entertain affirmations of that kind, unless they are prepared, at the same time, to recommend some remedy for the state of things which they fear. I say, at once, that is not a Constitutional proposition. It is the duty of private Members, who have to expound the grievances of the people, to expose the dangers to which they are exposed, and to suggest perhaps, if they can, a remedy. But if a case of grievance is proved, the responsibility rests where the power lies—with those who hold the functions and exercise the resources of the Government. My hon. Friend was not bound to provide a remedy, though I may add that, in the course of his speech, I think he did provide a remedy, which, if adopted, would be found to be quite effectual for this purpose. It would be useless and improper, the right hon. Gentleman thinks, to make an addition of this kind to the Address, unless the House were determined to deal with the subject-matter, and supply a full, complete, and satisfactory remedy. But what would follow upon the adoption of this Amendment? If the second clause of this Amendment were adopted by the House, declaring that the British taxpayers must not be plundered to give a fancy price to the Irish landlords, the Prime Minister, as I before observed, would be compelled to withdraw, or, at least, to modify, his declared and admitted policy, or else to resign his Office. If the first clause of the Amendment were carried, declaring that the Irish tenant, from causes beyond his own control, is unable to meet his rent, the noble Lord the Leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill) would be compelled, upon the instant, to withdraw the incitements which he has addressed to the landlords of Ireland, and to substitute for a policy of force, a policy of remedial measures. How, then, can the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham call that an abstract proposition which, if it were adopted by the House, would compel the Government to retreat from their admitted policy upon the instant, or to resign their Office? There is no more practical, no more instant way of bringing the Government to task than that adopted by the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and right well the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham knows it. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer, and, indeed, for that kind of intellectual stimulant the right hon. Member for West Birmingham yesterday had to depend upon the Opposition side. ["No, no!"; I hear the "baa" of the black sheep. Hon. Gentlemen cheer when the right hon. Gentleman declares that the Amendment of my hon. Friend puts forward an unnecessary affirmative and a gratuitous negative. Well, it used to be said in former years that the Party opposite were stupid;

and, certainly, they must have preserved their historical character in cheering that sentiment, for what is the meaning of saying that the Amendment declares an unnecessary affirmative? The right hon. Gentleman did not deny its truth; and I say, if it be true, it is not only necessary, but the declaration of it is urgent, and action upon it by the Government is imperative. What does he mean by saying that, in regard to Land Purchase, the Amendment affirms a gratuitous negative? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, like a true Radical of a certain type—a rare type I am glad to say—has such great consideration for an absent person who happens to be a Lord that he debars himself from referring, in the most delicate way, to the policy with which Great Britain has been ringing in the course of the past week. The country knows that the Government, by the highest authority, stands committed to a policy of Land Purchase which must plunder the British taxpayer; because it has been told, in the most unmistakable manner, that, even if the judicial rents are found to be too high, their sacredness is not to be invaded—the landlord is not to lose. The tenant will pay the landlord for the part of the judicial rent which is found not to be too high; and with regard to the part which is found to be too high, the landlord would be paid for it by the State. How can that be said to be a gratuitous negative which opposed itself to that which was publicly declared in the face of the entire country? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham also described the Amendment as an abstract proposition. Yes, it was abstract in the eyes of the right hon. Gentleman so far only as it referred to his old friend the British taxpayer, or to the poor Irish tenants; but it becomes concrete the moment it concerns the position of the Government. "I am not going," he said—

"To vote for any Amendment, the carrying of which would be equivalent to a Vote of Censure on the Government."

That is a simple policy; and, from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman, it greatly economizes the need of any argument. I do not see why he should not have confined himself to that one solitary sentence. Why should he not have risen at the Table and said—

"I am not going to vote for any Amendment, the carrying of which would be equivalent to a Vote of Censure upon the Government?" Of course, if he had followed that general declaration with arguments maintaining it, the speech would have been of some value; but, in this case, the declaration of support of the Government went in one direction, and the facts of admission, without exception, went all the other way. The first observation of the right hon. Gentleman upon that part of the Amendment of my hon. Friend, which deprecates the transfer of loss to the British taxpayer in respect of Land Purchase in Ireland, was that it was an anticipatory repudiation of a policy which found no expression whatever in the Queen's Speech. But what does the right hon. Gentleman find expression of in the Queen's Speech? If we were depending for information on the Queen's Speech our minds would be a virgin page. The noble Lord the Leader of the House, in regard to the Queen's Speech, appears to have adopted a novel and extraordinary policy—the policy of suppressing the intentions of the Government in the document intended by the Constitution to be the vehicle of their expression—in order, apparently, judging by his subsequent attempt in this House, to prevent the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) from discharging his Constitutional function by criticism in reply. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham declared not only that the Land Purchase policy, which is to throw the burden of excessive payment of rent upon the British taxpayer, was not contained in the Queen's Speech, but also that the existence of it is absolutely denied. If the Land Purchase policy is absolutely denied by Members of the Government, I challenge the noble Lord to say so. Will he confirm that statement of his ally in distress? Will he absolutely deny that a policy of Land Purchase for Ireland, transferring any loss to be incurred to the British taxpayer, is not to be the future policy of the Government? Really, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the noble Lord ought to have agreed more definitely upon this matter before they came down to the House. The country has been told that to revise the judicial rents would be dishonest; that it would not only be dishonest, but extremely inexpedient; that it would not only be extremely inexpedient, but would put an end to all finality in agriculture, and would deprive Ireland of that period of calm and repose which is so necessary for the enjoyment of the blessings of Tory rule, which we all know to be an essential need. The noble Lord, himself an authority of the Government, second in rank, if he be not indeed, in his own estimation, the first, declared that the Land Act of 1881 was final. He declared, in the most solemn language, that it was a very valid and binding contract between the State, the landlords, and the tenants of Ireland. If that be so, how, then, are the judicial rents to touched until the expiration of the 15 years? And as the Prime Minister declared that there is no use in tinkering with the Irish Land Question, or doing anything except making an unlimited substitution of single for double ownership, and as the rents are too high, and must, if necessary, be reduced, in which case the landlords are not to be at any loss, of course it follows that the portion of the judicial rents which is found to be too high must be paid by the British taxpayer. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH dissented.] Will the noble Lord, or the Chief Secretary for Ireland, give the House, now, the slightest indication that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was right when he said that it was no part of the policy of the Government to transfer to the taxpayer any loss involved in the purchase of land from the landlords? But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, a Gentleman with a proper facility for mental changes, declares that he, like my hon. Friend the Member for Cork, deprecates any transfer of loss to the British taxpayer; and he adds, that he does not believe that the Government will be so foolish as to make any provision of the kind. Well, I think I have conclusively shown that they have already been so foolish; and I may add, that I should be prepared for any folly on the part of any Government which accepts the clandestine guidance of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, the right hon. Gentleman is a master of an art most useful in dialectics, but out of place in frank debate—the art of the suppression of the part of the case which does not suit his purpose. How did he describe the Amendment of my hon. Friend? He said the Amendment deprecated any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were high. The Amendment does absolutely nothing of the kind. The Amendment of my hon. Friend is perfectly consistent with State-assisted purchase, no matter what may be the level of the rents. There are two ways of making a safe bargain upon the subject of rent with regard to purchase. One is to fix the annual rent at a fair level, and then to give the ordinary number of years' purchase; and another way is, if the annual rent be too high, to fix a number of years' purchase so low as to neutralize the excess of the annual rent. Is not this what the Amendment does? Does it not deprecate any transfer of loss from the owners to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland? But the right hon. Gentleman, in his speech, denied it, and, turning to us, said—"Why do you not answer me, and prove the contrary?" Now I turn to him, and I ask why, in the language of the Amendment before him on the Table, why does he deliberately leave out, in the Amendment of my hon. Friend, the clause which was its essential point, and which gives to it its character and its meaning? Does he think that conduct of that kind would ever give him an advantage in debate in an Assembly of English Gentlemen? If he does, he will surely find out his mistake. But the right hon. Gentleman was very anxious to know if the late Prime Minister had yet abandoned the Land Purchase Bill; and the right hon. Gentleman, setting himself up as an excellent judge of honour, held that the late Prime Minister was under an obligation of honour regarding it. What obligation of honour? The late Prime Minister, recognizing a certain amount of moral responsibility, made the Irish landlords an offer the most liberal that they will ever receive. An obligation of honour! Why, Sir, if you allow a man for a certain time to possess himself of the property of another, if you support him in aggression and extortion, if at length you have to abandon that policy, and to take a course of justice and fair play, if at that moment you say to that man—"I am prepared to make you an offer, I am willing to save you, and I can make you this offer the best I can make." Well, if he refuses that offer, spurns it, and, in fact, uses it for the purpose of bringing discredit upon the person who made it, where, I say, is the obligation of honour to renew it? No, Sir; I think if there is any more talk about honour, that the late Prime Minister might say, as Lady Teazle said to Charles Surface—"Had we not better leave honour out of the question?" Certainly, whatever may occur, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would never make the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham either the judge or the custodian of his honour. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) is not a very simple man, yet he gives other men very much his seniors, and who have very much the advantage of him both in intellectual ability and in experience of life, credit for more than extreme juvenile simplicity; and he wants to know from the late Prime Minister if he has abandoned his Land Bill. In reply, it will suffice to say that the late Prime Minister remembered that the right hon. Gentleman, in accordance with a very curious plan he has adopted—namely, that when seeking to defeat one measure of his opponent he expatiates and desants on the merit of another—had defeated himself (Mr. Gladstone) on the Home Rule measure by recounting and denouncing the dangers of the Land Bill. In playing the game of politics, a Member might, perhaps, be allowed to have the ace up his sleeve once, but he would not be allowed to have it there a second time. Then, as to the question of honour, I will answer that by saying that I believe the Liberal Party of the future will have in concert no concern in any scheme for plundering the tenants of Ireland. The sands in the glass are running out; and, in order to give the glass a second chance of running, it is necessary that the glass should be turned, and that, I am confident, is an act which the late Prime Minister will never be brought to perform. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham says a charge is brought against him, that he himself brought forward, in the Cabinet, a large scheme of Land Purchase, almost as extreme in principle as that of the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister, but more dangerous, and with less security to the British taxpayer. Sir, that is an interesting revelation. It does appear to me that his position in regard to the British taxpayer seems to be one of this nature—that whenever a Tory Government proposes to mulct the British taxpayer in the interests of the landlords, that they should be allowed to do so; but that, when he was on the Continent, a measure of Land Purchase having been brought forward by the Liberal Government, he made such measure a matter of hostile conduct, even when the measure of the late Prime Minister was perfectly safe, and involved not the slightest risk. Then the right hon. Gentleman considered such a scheme a fit measure for denunciation, because he loves the British taxpayer so well, and thinks that if any man is to take a liberty with him it must be himself. He was opposed to the scheme of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. ["Oh, oh!"] Another of the scanty flock! The right hon. Gentleman said that he had opposed the Land Purchase scheme of the late Government on the ground that it involved a risk so tremendous that it practically amounted to a certainty of loss. Now, Sir, I deliberately challenge that assertion. I say that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, that, if the fall in the prices of produce were established, the Irish tenants would show they were not unable to pay the rent which was the basis of this scheme, was not a valid argument, because we had reason to hope, from the fact that 20 years was fixed as the maximum period in the Bill of the late Prime Minister, that the Imperial Commission were to be allowed to fix any minimum they pleased, and special provisions were made in the Bill for cases on such estates, and on those mentioned by Sir James Caird, where economical rents had disappeared, or nearly disappeared; and it was the first duty of the Commission administering the Act to fix a number of years, so that the annual instalment to be paid by the tenant should not be unduly burdensome to him. We had, therefore, good reason to hope that the measure of the late Prime Minister, if carried, would not have involved any practical risk, and would not have resulted in any loss. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had surpassed the ordinary audacity of militant debate, when he said that his contention was that the Land Scheme of the late Prime Minister was backed by the Land Revenue of Ireland and nothing else. If he has any blushes left, let him prepare to blush. The advances under the Land Purchase scheme of the late Prime Minister were backed, not only by the Land Revenue of Ireland, but by every penny of the Public Revenue. The late Prime Minister fixed the issue—

MR. LEWIS (Londonderry): I rise to Order. ["Oh, oh!"] I wish to know whether the hon. Member is in Order in discussing upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork the provisions of the Land Purchase Bill of the late Government?

MR. SPEAKER: The last paragraph of the Amendment deals with the Land Purchase scheme. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton) is consequently in Order.

MR. SEXTON: I may also point out that the alleged defect in the Land Purchase scheme of the late Government formed the reason assigned by the right hon. Gentleman for voting against this Amendment, and I am defending the Amendment. The scheme of the late Prime Minister was backed by every penny of public money of Ireland. Let us suppose the issue of the scheme amounted to £150,000,000; let it also be understood that a great part of the pastoral lands were excluded from the operation of the Land Scheme; also that the Purchase Commission had power to say in any case whether the terms of sale were fair, and that the Purchase Commission had power to refuse their sanction to sell at all, and that it was within the discretion of the Imperial Commission to limit these. Suppose there was this issue, then that would involve the Government in Ireland in an annual liability of £2,000,000. Has the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, however, forgotten that the tenant, under that scheme, was to pay 20 years' purchase on the full judicial rent, and that the landlord was only to receive the same number of years' purchase on the nett rent—that is to say, the rent, after deducting from it various charges, calculated to amount to four years; so that while the tenants paid on 20 years, the landlord was to be paid upon 16 years; and the difference of four years upon the rental went, as a guarantee fund, into the hands of the Irish Treasury under the scheme of the late Prime Minister? Then, for this £2,000,000 the Irish Government would have been bound to pay to you, they were entitled to receive from the tenants £2,400,000; that was secured by the Land Bill. There was also the additional security of the Public Revenue. The right hon. Gentleman said last night it only left a few hundred thousand pounds. I hope he has not such a loose manner of managing the finances of Birmingham. The Public Revenue of Ireland amounts to £8,000,000. The charges upon it, under the scheme of the late Prime Minister, amounted to about £4,500,000, but that amount included £1,000,000 for a Constabulary Force. That Constabulary Force was to cease in a couple of years, as soon as the Irish Government could raise a suitable Native Force. [Inter-ruption.] Just so; I am perfectly well aware that a Native Force would be disagreeable to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Sanderson). Therefore, the payment of £1,000,000 sterling in support of the Constabulary would cease, bringing the liability down to £3,500,000. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the Revenue might fall. Has it ever fallen? Look back upon the records of the Irish Revenue, and you will not find that it has fallen. We take good care that it does not fall. It has been on a steady increase from year to year, sometimes to a very considerable extent. There is certainly no such thing as a falling back in my study of the record of Ireland. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to raise against us a plea which is not sustained by experience, and which all experience shows to the contrary. The right hon. Gentleman also made a point of the fact that the Imperial control, in the full sense of the word, was to be retained only over the Customs and Excise. But every penny of the Irish Revenue was to pass into, and through, the hands of British Imperial officials, and all the obligations to England would have had to be discharged, before a penny could have been applied to the Public Service of that country. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman's point about the security altogether fails; for you have the absolute security of a fund of £7,000,000 a-year paid into the hands of an Imperial official, and yet the right hon. Gentleman suggests that that involves risk. If his private fortune is as well invested, he may smile at the uncertainty of finance. I think I have shown that the security is ample; but the right hon. Gentleman goes on to say that he is willing to lend to an integral portion of the Kingdom, but that he is not willing to lend to what would practically be a foreign country. Let me ask him, and let me solemnly ask the House, which looks more like the foreign country, the country which Lord Aberdeen left the other day, or the country to which Sir Redvers Buller went yesterday? Sir, I take these two instances as the types of Union and Disunion. I say, when the people of Dublin—the working men, the trades and the National League—accompanied Lord Aberdeen on his departure, and gave him, as he left their shores, their blessings and congratulations, that instance, I say, was the type of true Union. That incident was also the fruit of the policy of the late Prime Minister—a policy which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has condemned; and, Sir, if that policy could have been continued, it would have been well, for it is not by the despatch of gallant officers who have solved similar troubles in other parts of the world, that you will solve the problem of disaffection in Ireland. No, Sir, because in that case the Union between the people of this country and the people of Ireland would be a Union which the unnatural combination of intriguing politicians would not be able longer to delay. The Union that should endure cannot be a forced Union procured with manacles, but a voluntary union of hearts. Lord Aberdeen had been in Ireland, and his experience was that you must readily and must effectively meet the desires of the Irish people if they were desired to be loyal to the Throne and to be faithful to the interests of the Government; and he endeavoured to maintain the unity of the Empire by fairly considering their interests and their rights; and Lord Aberdeen witnessed a sight which he declared he could never forget. Sir, the Government's policy is to follow Lord Aberdeen with Sir Redvers Buller. The last time I saw the exploits of Sir Redvers Buller was where they were pictorially depicted. He was sitting on a camel in the Desert. There was a box on the back of the camel. He had a sword by his side as long as himself, and a telescope was placed to his eye as he looked out for Tokar. His being sent to Ireland makes it look more like a foreign country.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman does not appear to be dealing very closely with the subject of the Amendment—the difficulty of tenants to pay their rents.

Mr. SEXTON: I was endeavouring to deal with the Land Purchase scheme, and that point in the Amendment relating to it. I shall not pursue the subject, but shall put myself right with you. I shall endeavour to point out the reason why the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is untenable. That right hon. Gentleman said he would give cordial support to any proposal the Government would make for the establishment of a peasant proprietary in Ireland, provided that the whole arrangement was under the complete and effective control of the Imperial Parliament, and carried out, as he described in his speech last night, through the intervention of and by the Municipal Authorities. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me, and tell the House, or tell the country, now, or at any future time, had the collection of instalments for repayment of Land Purchase in Ireland been made more certain, or more safe, by being collected by the hands of the Imperial Government? I say the difficulty of collection will be greater on that account. If, on the other hand, the collections were made by the agents of the Native Government, the people, I think, would make greater, and even more painful, exertions to meet their obligations. Certainly, a plan such as that of the late Prime Minister, by which the Government would be relieved from the embarrassing necessity of going to the door of every individual tenant and collecting the tax from them, and would have the security of the good faith of the Irish Government and the whole of the Public Revenue—that would be a better system and one more secure than that of the right hon. Gentleman. The noble Lord the Leader of the House contemplates that this Commission shall inquire into the arrangements made in congested districts, in which Local Bodies will have to give security for the repayment of loans. Was there ever a more fantastic proposition? These congested districts are the very places where Sir James Caird and The Times say the economical rent has disappeared; but we do not go that length. It is not necessary for our argument. We only contend that the rents are too high. The noble Lord, in effect, proposed that some Local Body should be constituted, to place on the people the new burden of the defalcations of their neighbours. At any moment, upon the bankruptcy of these Local Bodies, the security of the noble Lord would disappear into thin air. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has said that he would not vote for an Amendment which, if adopted, would have the effect of a Vote of Censure upon the Government. He says he is willing to wait, and his speech was conceived in the spirit of a waiter. It is long to wait. We are, in spite of the terrible urgency of affairs in Ireland, to wait as long as the Government wish; but let me point out what must be obvious to the House, that when the Government have ceased to wish they will be a Government no longer. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, the right hon. Gentleman met our arguments concerning the fall in prices, by the statement that the enormous sums which are paid for the tenant right are an argument against our contention that the rents are too high. He said that the argument had been previously produced in the course of this debate, and in saying that I suppose he referred to the humorous speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is, of course, equal to every emergency. If he had lived at Rome, in the time of Nero, he would have been one to play second fiddle to Nero when the city was burning. The hon. and gallant Gentleman told the House the story of Gweedore—Gweedore, that wretched spot where the tenants by a labour worse than penal servitude have made some soil on the face of the rock, and where every year some of these tenants are thrown on the public funds. The case of Gweedore, as he stated it, was this—there are a large number of tenants paying very small rents, none of them over £4, and some of them as low as half-a-crown, and he stated two or three cases where the tenants of these wretched holdings had been able to sell them for sums as large as £100. It is true that the tenant right of some of these small holdings have been bought at a high price; but those who have paid the money are persons who had originally gone from the district—some of these persons had gone to America, or Australia, or England, or other parts of the world, and, after having by long years of labour scraped together a little fortune, they have gone back to Gweedore to spend the end of their days in the place where they were born. The hon. and gallant Gentleman will not differ from me when I say that the love of these people for their native soil, and the spot where they were born, is passionate in the extreme, and I can tell him these prices of £80 or £100 which these people gave for the strip of bog that is their native spot, is not to be taken as any test of the commercial value of the strip of bog. This passionate love for the place where these people were born, apart from the commercial aspect of the question, is the very reason why the Legislature found it necessary to interfere, the landlords having all the land in their hands, and the land being necessary for the sustenance of the people, because your policy had left them no other means of living. The landlords, in these circumstances, could always command for the tenant right a price absolutely and fabulously in excess of any value which it possessed. If the bulk of the tenants on the Gweedore estate desired to sell their tenant right, they could not do it; but, occasionally, there turns up some returned emigrant, who has some money to fall back upon, and he is willing to give a large sum for the strip of bog as a matter of affection and not of commercial value. What is the value of this splendid estate of which we have heard so much? This splendid estate on the coast of Donegal is valued by the Government official at 7*d.* an acre. That took in, of course, the good parts with the bad. Had it not been for the good parts, there could have been no valuation so high as 7*d.* an acre. If the Commissioners had been obliged to value certain parts, they would have laboured under the difficulty of finding any coin small enough to express the amount. These people formerly lived in villages, forming pastoral communities, with common rights of grazing. Captain Hill, the landlord, or rather his father, some 40 years ago, broke up the communities in the villages, put an end to the pastoral life of the people, took from them the only thing that was of any value—the common right of grazing, and, with a cruelty which would open the eyes of the British people, if they knew to what use the laws are turned in Ireland, sent these unfortunate people, without any particle of dwellings, on to the bog as it came from the hand of nature. The tenants, going on to these strips of bog, quarried stone from the granite quarries, and built houses and out-offices for themselves. They drained, fenced, and manured the bogs, turned what had been rough grazing into arable land, and the landlord raised the rent as they went on. Can the hon. and gallant Gentleman deny what I assert, that when £80 or £100 is given for the purchase of the tenant right of one of these holdings, it is given, not for the landlord's legal and equitable rights in the strip of bog, the only thing that belongs to him, but the tenant's interest in the houses, the out-offices, the fences, the drains, the reclaimed soil, and everything which give value to the strip of bog? One other fact—Captain Hill, by threats and other devices, kept the tenants out of the Land Court as long as he could. [Cries of "No!" and counter cries of "He did!"] How, and when, did they go in? He gave them to understand that, if they went into the Land Court, he would swamp them with the cost of appeals. They struggled into the Land Court, nevertheless, at last, and what became of their suffering landlord, whose case has excited the sympathy of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. What did the Sub-Commissioners take off the rents? The average reduction of rent all over Ireland is less than 20 per cent. The reduction of the rents of Captain Hill was 37 per cent. The gallant gentleman felt so outraged at this that he brought the case immediately under the notice of the Chief Commissioners, and the Chief Commissioners were themselves so much startled at this extraordinary reduction, that they departed from the usual course of official routine, and fixed a special sitting on the spot for the examination of the reduction. I here come to a fact which, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh was not so much an Englishman as not to know when he was beaten, he would admit that his case was pulverized. The Chief Commissioners confirmed the reduction, and the Court which gave and confirmed that reduction of the two-fifths of the rents had before them all the facts stated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as to the number of their holdings, the smallness of the amounts of rent, and the sums given for the tenant right. With these facts before them, the judicial tribunal appointed by this House, and responsible to the country, gave this verdict, reducing the rents by 37 per cent; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham says that we are to be patient. He says that the late Government came into Office as a Government of Inquiry, and that this Government is also a Government of Inquiry. There is inquiry and inquiry. The late Government made its inquiries of the public bodies in Ireland, and of those who were most competent to give them authentic information upon the matter in question. The late Government also followed up their inquiry by prompt and decisive action; but, Sir, the present Government intend to confine inquiry to a body of their own nominees. Nor do they intend to expedite the action or the Report of their Commission. They have told us it is not to be made before the end of next spring; and when the end of next spring comes and the Report arrives, the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer declares, in advance, that that Report will require immense consideration. As an admirer of the style of the noble Lord, I am amazed at his phrases, and at a loss to know where he gets them. We cannot certainly have any decision in the shape of a legislative proposal upon the Report of the Commission of Inquiry before the end of the Session of next year. What is to happen in the meantime? The crash will come, unless something is done to confront the difficulty, and avert it during this winter. Yet the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the noble Lord would have us rely upon their Commission of Inquiry. Still, I might have had some confidence in the Commission of Inquiry, if they had been allowed to answer the questions which have been put to them. But the noble Lord has adopted a course destructive of all confidence, for he has laid certain questions before this Commission, of his own nomination, and then has proceeded himself to answer his own questions. Certainly, I should feel no confidence in the decision of a Court, if the Judge of the Court had the selection of the jury, and if, before the jury retired to deliberate, he delivered to them the verdict to which they were to come. The noble Lord says the Commissioners are to be appointed to inquire into what extent and in what parts of Ireland the operations of the Land Act is affected by a combination to resist the enforcement of legal obligations—that is to say, the payment of rent. Would it not have been more judicious on the part of the noble Lord, as a statesman, even from his own point of view, to have abstained from delivering any opinion on the question? He said that Her Majesty's Government were aware that a great and widespread organization had endeavoured, not without success, arbitrarily to control the working of that Act to their own ends. What is to be inquired into by the Commission? I know something about Ireland, and I certainly am not aware of any such organization. If the noble Lord refers to the National League, I can tell him that the policy of the National League is to assist evicted tenants. The policy of that body is to advise tenants to pay the utmost rents which they are able to pay—["Oh, oh!"]—having regard to the value of the produce of their farms. ["Oh, oh!"] Sir, there is a combination of landlords in Ireland. There is a combination by which landlords aid one another with funds and with counsel to promote and stimulate evictions, to take possession of lands from which the tenants have been evicted, and to induce the Government, if they can, to abolish the National League, so that when the tenants are thrown out upon the highways, they may not even have the resources of public benevolence, but be driven to the workhouse. But the noble Lord asks the Commission a second question. The Commission are to inquire whether there has been an exceptional fall in the price of produce. Why, Sir, we might as well have a Commission to inquire whether in Ireland, as in other parts of the world, the sun produces the daylight. What is the meaning of this Commission? The noble Lord had only to examine the file of any newspaper to ascertain that there had been an exceptional fall in prices. He had only to step into the Office of the Board of Trade to ascertain that fact, or, without going outside the circle of the Cabinet, he might have inquired of the Secretary of State for War Mr. W. H. Smith, in whom the Government have great confidence. "Hear, hear!" Certainly, they must have; because they allowed him to turn their Irish policy topsy-turvy in 24 hours. Why did not the noble Lord inquire of the Secretary of State for War why he has taken 40 per cent off the rents of his tenants in Suffolk? The Secretary of State for War is an eminent man of business. I am sure he is not an hysterical philanthropist. He would not take 40 per cent off his rents; he would not even take off 1 per cent, unless there was good reason for it. If the noble Lord had asked the Secretary of State for War why it was that this year he had taken 40 per cent off the rents of his tenants in Suffolk, I am satisfied that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman would have proved to demonstration that it was in consequence of fall in prices. Why did not the noble Lord write to Sir James Caird? I would not ask him to write to the editor of The Times; because, of course, when it is a question of whether the Irish tenant can give security for the land, The Times sets him down as a man of straw; whereas, when it is a question of paying his rent, The Times describes him as a sort of bucolic Cæsar. But Sir James Caird is an eminent man, whose position is such that he could not risk his reputation by any such causeless change of opinion; and he would have been glad to have submitted to him a Memorandum of his own in March of this year, in which he went so far as to state that in the case of four-fifths of the holdings of Ireland, economical rent had disappeared. How otherwise could it have disappeared except by the fall in prices? But the noble Lord gives the Sub-Commissioners and the Land Court credit for the gift of prophecy, for he said that not only did they take into account the state of the crisis, when they fixed the judicial rent, but that they left ample scope for any fall in prices. I challenge the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman beside him on this point. They have different functions in the House; for while the noble Lord puts spirit into the serried ranks behind him, the right hon. Gentleman instils fear into those in front of him. I would refer the noble Lord to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Meath Mr. Mahony, which has not been answered and will not be answered, because it is unanswerable. What did my hon. Friend say? He was engaged in fixing rents for three years, and began in 1882. At that time the Commissioners took the prices from 1876, and there had been a period of depression from 1877 till 1881. No doubt, the Commissioners fixed rents upon the average of the low prices of those years; but what says my hon. Friend? He says that the period of depression had already lasted so long that, judging by the duration of former periods of depression, they calculated it was near its end, especially as the year 1882, in which they began to fix the rents, was an exceptionally good year. They made up their minds, so far from leaving scope for the fall in rent, that the good time had come. Will the Government inquire of the Sub-Commissioners whether that is, or is not, the case? My hon. Friend referred to the five separate articles on which the Irish farmers pay their rent when they pay it at all; and he showed, taking the average of the years on which the rent was fixed, and the prices of produce in the present year, that the prices had fallen on the different articles from 22 to 45 per cent, or an average of 25 per cent all round. What is the effect of that upon the tenant's ability to pay rent? The effect is greater by far than the nominal percentage. There is an old and general rule which gives one-third of the produce for the rent; one-third for the cost of production; and one-third for the profit of the tenant. Does the House accept the rule, or is there any rule that would better please the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the Unionist Liberals or the noble Lord? Suppose we take that rule, and say that the value of the produce of a farm was £60 when the judicial rent was fixed; let us assume also that prices have since fallen by 25 per cent, and that the Sub-Commissioners take the average prices between 1878 and 1882, and upon the average they fix the rent; but if the value of produce has fallen by 25 per cent, £15 is taken off, and where is that to come from?

[Seventh Night.]

If you take that £15 off the profits of the tenant, you leave him not £20, but £5. I say, in order to place the tenant this year in as good a position as he stood in when judicial rents were fixed, that the £15 should come off the landlord's rent. I must say I frankly regret the argument that if the tenant, in a bad year is to have a remission made to him, in a good year the surplus should be given to the landlord. The landlord is a person who, without doing anything for it, receives a considerable income. The tenant is a person who obtains a fair subsistence by his hard labour; and if any man tells me that when a chance of a good year comes, the tenant is not to be allowed to lay by a few pounds for sickness and old age, but that he must put these few pounds into the hands of the landlord, I say that the doctrine is revolting to humanity and civilization. What is the effect of the argument I have brought before the House? Taking the judicial rents as they were fixed, accepting the rate of one-third for rent, one-third for cost of production, and one-third for tenant's profits, and calculating upon the basis of a fall in prices of 25 per cent, I say that the tenants of Ireland, to be as well off as they were in 1882, should have their rents reduced by 75 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham endeavoured to embarrass the Irish Party by quoting the speech of an absent Gentleman in this House. He is not here, but I am here to speak for him. This speech was made as far away as Chicago, at the Convention; and the point of the reference to the speech was this—that we are determined to make trouble for the Government in Ireland; that if trouble occurs in Ireland it will be our fault; and that, in point of fact, if the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes down in November, as he expects to do, to propose a Coercion Bill—for that is the real point of his policy, and all the rest is kite-flying—if he comes down in November to propose a Coercion Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham will support him, on the ground that they are entitled to look with suspicion upon the accounts of the inability of the tenants to pay. It may be interesting to the right hon. Gentleman to know this in connection with the Chicago Convention. He used to say, tauntingly, in words which came strangely from the lips of a Radical, that you (the English) are 30,000,000 people, and that we (the Irish) are only 5,000,000. But the Chicago Convention is one of those facts which proves to any intelligent observer that if you are 30,000,000, we are nearer 25,000,000 than 5,000,000. He challenged us to answer whether or not we adopted the language used by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. J. Redmond) at Chicago, when he said it would be the duty of the Irish Members to make government in Ireland impossible. Well, the first remark I have to make to that is this—if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington have their way, they will soon make the present system of English government in Ireland impossible. And that not because of the resistance of Ireland, as because of the disgust of the people of England. I must again observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in quoting my hon. Friend the Member for Wexford, pursued a policy of unjustifiable reserve. Why did he sever a phrase from its context in his speech? Why did he distort and mutilate it to disguise its meaning? I shall supply the omission. My hon. Friend said—

Mr. Sexton

“The principle embodied in the Irish movement to-day is just the same principle as was embodied in every Irish movement for seven centuries. The settlement offered was one honourable alike to England and to Ireland, and such a settlement was offered to us by Mr. Gladstone.”

That was the language frankly and courageously used many thousands of miles away, in the presence of the bitterest enemies of England and those who have suffered the bitterest wrongs at her hands. All those wrongs, however, were forgotten, and the feeling uppermost in the hearts of the Irish race at home and abroad was that of gratitude to the aged statesman who proposed to do us justice. Sir, Ireland was ready to forget and forgive her injuries. She was ready to sacrifice many things for the sake of peace, so long as the one essential principle of her own Senate was granted to her. She was willing, on the day when the doors of her ancient Senate House were opened, to shake hands with her relentless foe, to make peace with the nation when the Almighty so placed that the two people might be friends, but who had been kept apart by war, injustice, and passion. Member for West Birmingham : Yes, Sir, I have given England the most convincing proof that, on the occasion of a trial, we can be trusted friends. It now remains but to prove, for the benefit of the slave, that as slaves we can be friends. Sir, I adopt those words of my friend Mr. J. Russell. I do not mean, in the natural law, nor in the law of nations, nor in the law prevailing between England and Ireland, any obligation upon men, conscious of intellect in their minds, and conscious of the rights in their bosoms, tamely to accept slavery at the hands of another nation. The Constitution says we are free men. We will exert ourselves to the uttermost of our power, as our constitution permits, to maintain the Constitution, and that of liberation regards any statement, or any man who has the position without the intellect of a statesman, who presumes to attempt to violate it. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for West Birmingham declared that he was satisfied with the results of the General Election. He is evidently concealing himself with that cynical hostility which declares those to be false, whom we expect nothing, and whom we prize as a reward for their lack of support in the Kingdom, a plea of satisfaction in another. Sir, I cannot resist, on the face of it, the mind of the statesman who is satisfied with an Election which has elected his own Party, which, out of 70 now candidates presented by him and his Friends, returned only five.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : I rise to Order. Sir, I wish to know if the hon. Member is in Order in referring to the late Election? What has that to do with the Amendment before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER : I understand the hon. Member to be speaking on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, which is now before the House, and on which he is entitled to reply. I think the subject of the General Election has no bearing whatever on the Amendment before the House.

Mr. SEXTON : Sir, I shall not attempt any further to reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham on this subject. But, Sir, I will say, in conclusion, that we know the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and I will say matters very little what his policy may be. He used to be, at one time, perhaps, a somewhat influential Member of this House. Now, if he is the head of a Party at all, it is a Party that can be very easily accommodated in a box. He is more a Tory than the Tories themselves. His policy now is to do for nothing —

Mr. CHAPLIN : Order, order!

Mr. SEXTON : I am dealing with the Amendment. Recent occurrences seem to have given the right hon. Member for Sleaford a very unquiet mind. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is to vote against anything which may have the effect of a Vote of Censure on the Government. The policy of the noble Lord the Leader of the House is to draw bills upon the future, which he does not intend to honour at their maturity. His ostensible policy is an inquiry which is to bear fruit next year, but it will have no relation to the present state of politics when —

Mr. CHAPLIN : I will leave the other hon. Members to pursue the business of the House.

Mr. SEXTON : I put when they are in the Government of Ireland. Then, Sir, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said his assurance on the point of the employment of troops was superfluous. Yes, it was superfluous; it was only meant as an assurance, but it acquired a weight from the words he had used. The noble Lord had plainly told the landlords of Ireland that they should exact the full rents this winter, because the payment of the full rents will be regarded as proof, when the scheme of Purchase comes to be considered, that the rents are not too high. Sir, we wait the result with feelings of the greatest apprehension, and I wish to say we will not be responsible for the consequences. I wish also to say, at this moment, that we are not deceived by the noble Lord or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; we wish to say that we are convinced that this Commission on the material resources of Ireland will never come to anything. The question of the maintenance of the Constitution in Ireland, and the right of the Irish people to live in their homes, and to be relieved of the effects of an economic crisis over which they have no control, will be tested and tried by the Government. That is the ostensible policy of the Government, and the issue will be tried between the Irish people and the Government before that ostensible policy can be put to the test. Sir, our policy in the matter is clear. It is to stand as far as we can by our people. We will counsel them always to stand by one another. We will ask them not to be intimidated by any words concerning combination. The combination among the landlords must be met by combination for defence on the part of the tenants. No doubt, Sir, we shall bid them remember with gratitude and confidence the efforts of the great statesman to establish peace between Great Britain and Ireland. We shall conjure them also to remember that 1,250,000 of the voters of Great Britain have declared for them. We shall also ask them to believe that the majority against the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian at the last Election was a factitious majority; that it was a majority of only 70,000 upon 2,800,000, being only one in every 40 who went to the poll. We shall point to that majority made up, and more than made up and accounted for, by the plural votes of the Tory squires in England, as a majority not of men but of votes; and that if the majority of votes was against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the majority of men was with him. We shall ask the people of Ireland to remember that fact. But we have hope, Sir, we do not yet abandon hope, that the Irish people, even in the midst of their struggle of the coming winter, may be able to avoid excesses and outrages. We have still some hope that the landlords of Ireland will not act harshly. If landlords like the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), who have intelligence to consider all sides of the question, think of that, they must feel some concern for the future of their country; and if they use their influence with the landlords of Ireland, we are not without hope that the evil incitements of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be without avail. But, whatever may happen, there is one thing we shall not do. In the presence of the indication from the Government that the payment of full rents this winter will be forced from the people, before the Commission which is to fix whether these rents can be paid or not has commenced to sit, the Irish Members will not place themselves in the position of estate bailiffs and rent collectors to the landlords of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham thought the hon. Member for Cork was bound to place himself in the position of a rent collector. He says the influence of the hon. Member for Cork has been great in the past, and it will be powerful now, if he used it to induce the tenants to pay their rents. Why, Sir, even the Leader of a Cabinet is not always able to control the passions of the limited number of persons who compose it, although, perhaps, they may have no occasion to complain, except what is given them by their own inordinate vanity and disordered imaginations. How, then, can a public Leader be expected to control a whole people? There are depths of passions, there are extremities of despair which are beyond all public control, and their methods and modes of displaying their exasperation at unjust usage are such as to get beyond the reach of any public Leader. My hon. Friend the Member for Cork, and other members of the National League—I am proud to think I also did myself—used their influence in the early part of this year to the utmost in urging people to bear their wrongs with patience. We used our influence, when we could rationally use it, at the earliest moment at which we were able, to qualify the anger, fear, and despair of the people, by showing them that there was some ground for hope. As soon as we were able to show the people that an English statesman was about to appeal to the English people for justice to Ireland, we used our influence to the fullest extent. But does anyone mean to tell me that if the Irish people are to be confronted with a policy of Sir Redvers Buller, if the policy to be applied to the Irish people by the Government is the method of dealing with savage tribes, of evictions, of refusing to recognize the ruinous fall in the price of agricultural produce, of the Government shutting their eyes to notorious evils, and refusing to recognize the wrongs under which they suffer, does anyone tell me that, in the face of facts and of a policy like that, the Irish Members are to go to the people of Ireland and say to them that they ought to strip their fields, to sell their little stock, to plunge themselves in debt for the purpose of croaking an argument against themselves? If we were to do so, does the House not think that the Irish people would condemn us as cowards and fools. We will do anything that is possible in fairness and justice, on the basis of reason, to promote justice and peace between the two nations. From the bottom of our hearts we ardently desire it; but we cannot make ourselves traitors to our country, or degrade it, by asking the people of Ireland this winter to pauperize themselves in order to furnish arguments to their own ruin. There is just one thing in which I agree with the Government. I agree with them that they are not likely to fall into any error, at least in their ostensible policy, by reason of hurry or undue haste. They certainly have fallen into what, I fear, will prove to be for one Party, if not for both, a fatal error hereafter, by making the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the Dictator of their Cabinet policy, and their Leader in debates in this House. But the Government are protected from further errors from undue hurry or haste; because, as a man who has brought himself to pauperism is protected against robbery, so the Government is protected from error hereafter by having made every possible error at the outset.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West) said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had gone over a good deal of ground, and had occupied considerable time in endeavouring to make his position clear; but he Sir Walter B. Barttelot, regretted to say, and he challenged any impartial person to contradict him, he could find no effort on the part of the hon. Gentleman, in the course of his lengthened speech, to let fall one word with the intention of appeasing the discontent which was so rife in Ireland. On the contrary, from beginning to end, the course the hon. Member had pursued was one calculated to be detrimental to the best interests of peace and order in Ireland. A great deal had been said by the hon. Member as to the manifestation of popular respect when Lord Aberdeen left Dublin, and the love which the Irish people had evinced for the last Viceroy, because of the measures promised by the late Prime Minister. But they had heard a good deal about demonstrations of that kind being got up for a particular purpose; and he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) maintained that the demonstration in question was an organized demonstration, not the spontaneous outburst of loyalty, not the expression of that steadily growing Loyal Party in whose interest we were bound to maintain law and order. In order to carry out that duty, he was glad that an officer (Sir Redvers Buller) who had done good service in Egypt had been selected, although the name of this officer recalled remembrances that must ever remain dark blots on the record of the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister.

MR. TANNER (Cork, Mid) rose to Order, and asked whether these references, for which his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) was called to Order, were permitted?

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that he must not press his illustrations too far.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: The hon. Gentleman had twitted them with the smallness of the majority of electors (70,000) by which the present Government was carried into Office at the last Election; but he had omitted to take into account the large number of unopposed returns. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that the preceding speaker was called to Order for touching on this subject, and that the hon. and gallant Gentleman is now following his example.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought that, in fairness, such statements should not pass without reply. He was proud to consider himself as one representing a majority of the people in favour of the Union, and to be supported by many on the other side of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that he is travelling beyond the Amendment, which has reference to the payment of rents in the ensuing winter.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, there could be no doubt that the Sub-Commissioners, in fixing judicial rents, did take into account the fluctuations of prices. The speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) on the question had simply added fuel to the fire. Everything had been said by the right hon. Gentleman which could prevent the tenants paying their rents. Neither had the right hon. Gentleman, nor the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, said or done any one thing that showed that the depreciation of rents was so great that the tenants were unable, according to the Land Act of 1881, to pay their rents. Previous speakers, also, in dealing with this point, had omitted to take into consideration that the likelihood of a fall in agricultural produce was estimated by the Commissioners before fixing the judicial rents. Hon. Members had likewise failed to recognize the high probability of a good harvest being obtained in Ireland this year, as well as an increase in the price of stock. He was able to say, from his own knowledge, that the price of stock had risen, and was rising, for both cattle and sheep that had recently come over from Ireland had fetched a higher price than obtained a short time ago. These were matters that ought to be considered in connection with a question of this magnitude and gravity; for both of the right hon. Gentlemen he had referred to had stated that the tenants could not pay their rents, and they had tried to make the Government of Ireland impossible by those who were now in authority.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.), rising to Order, asked whether it was conformable to precedent for an hon. Member (Mr. Caine) who was not a Privy Councillor nor a Member of the late Government to occupy the Front Opposition Bench?

MR. SPEAKER motioned to the hon. and gallant Baronet to proceed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT, resuming, said, he would ask the attention of the House to the circumstances of the distress in Ireland in the years 1846, 1847, and 1848, and the outrage and crime by which it was accompanied. It was his fate to be in Ireland at that time, assisting in the work of restoring order, and while the people of England voted enormous sums for the relief of the Famine, the law was rigorously carried out, and Ireland became tranquil. At that time, though crime had followed evictions, it did not appear, from the arrests made, that outrages were committed by the class suffering from evictions. Hon. Gentlemen from Ireland had said—"Give us a Statutory Parliament in College Green; let that be once firmly established, and everything will be peace, and rents will go up." But would that be so? He remembered being at Limerick in 1847-8, when the "Old Ireland" Party and the "Young Ireland" Party were very hostile to each other; indeed, so much so, that it became necessary to protect the latter from the violent action of the former. Indeed, he then only arrived just in the nick of time to prevent Mr. Mitchel, Mr. Martin, and their friends from suffering violence. Mr. Mitchel and many of his friends were afterwards transported for life, or terms of years. And then there was "the cabbage garden business" of Mr. Smith O'Brien, after which Ireland remained quiet, prosperous, contented, and happy for 20 years. He was all in favour of doing everything that was just and generous for Ireland; but when we had treason, cruelty, and murder going on in that country, we were bound to use the powers of the law to maintain order, and repress crime, the only way of making Ireland happy and prosperous. He was anxious that the policy of the Government should be carried out, because he believed it would do more for Ireland than the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Nor could he help commenting on the strange circumstance that, when they proposed to do for Ireland what Irishmen had been so long asking for in the way of improving the fisheries, harbours, and arterial drainage, and carrying on other public works, they were now met by the cry that Ireland did not want anything of the kind. He did not know why land should not pay a fair rent; but that was what the hon. Members opposite objected to. They desired that it should be let at prairie value, which was not only unjust, but was an act of spoliation of the owners of land, and would be most injurious to the prosperity of the country. He believed not only that the masses of this country were in favour of maintaining the Union, as, indeed, their votes at the recent Election had proved, but that they would be more and more decidedly in favour of that course the more they came to understand the bearing of the question on their own interests. If the Union were rejected and a Statutory Parliament established in Ireland, such would be the state of things in Ireland that Irishmen would be driven over to England, not by fifties and hundreds, but by tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in search of work. They would thus glut the English labour market and depress the wages of English workmen. That was not a result that was desirable, or that the English masses could be anxious to promote, when they understood the danger to which the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would expose them. It was because he, and those who acted with him, desired that Irishmen should be happy and prosperous, and get work in their own country, that they were determined to do all in their power to maintain the Union. That the Union had tended to promote the prosperity of Ireland was, in fact, clear from the admission of the hon. Member who had just spoken—namely, that during the existence of the Union, the Revenue of Ireland had steadily and continuously increased. To what other cause than the Union could that increase be attributed? He knew of none, and that was an additional reason for supporting the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, he was anxious, before the debate closed, to make a few remarks upon the Amendment and the speech of the hon. Member for Cork; but after the singularly able and effective speech of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) he had some little hesitation in rising. The hon. Member's speech would make it unnecessary for him to say much which he intended to say; but, so long as Irish questions were to be dealt with in the Imperial Parliament, he thought it was the duty of every English Member who had given some attention to the subject to take part in debates of this kind. He would not follow the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) in his predictions as to what would take place in the course of the autumn in Ireland in consequence of the refusal of Parliament to meet the demands of the Irish Members. He should always feel very great hesitation in expressing his views as to what would take place in Ireland if Parliament finally refused the demands of the Irish people, lest he should appear by anticipation to sanction courses which it would be his duty to deprecate and condemn. He was also exceedingly anxious to avoid saying or doing anything which might seem to embarrass the Government and add to the difficulties of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He appreciated to the full the difficulties which the Government would have to meet in Ireland and in that House. They had adopted a policy which he believed to be impossible. He believed that they would not be able to carry out the policy which they had proclaimed; but he was unwilling to do anything to increase their difficulties. He said so himself in good faith. There were many instances and illustrations in the history of Ireland in which the demands of the Irish people had been refused by the English Parliament and the English Government, which demands had later on been conceded in answer to agitation and disorder almost amounting to rebellion. The history of Ireland during the last 85 years was full of instances of that character, and they might perhaps judge of the future by the past. He felt sure that the Irish Members and the Irish people would recollect that the present position was very different from any in the past in relation to this subject. The Irish Members did not now stand alone; they had on their side the great majority of the Liberal Party of England, and only a few less than a majority of the electors of England. They might also recollect that they had also on their side the greatest, most powerful Minister of modern times, who had sacrificed himself and his Government on their behalf. Remembering this, he thought it would be very unfortunate if anything should occur in Ireland which would make the task which the Liberal Party in this country experienced—and still had before them—in carrying out the programme of justice to which they had given their adhesion a more difficult one than it need be. He was quite sure that Irish Members would appreciate this, and he was glad to observe that the hon. Member for Cork did fully appreciate it in the speech which he made a night or two ago. Some hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House saw in the speech of the hon. Member for Cork an indication of disorder which they seemed to think that the hon. Member approved of. He must say that he had listened to that speech, and had interpreted it in a totally different sense. His belief was that the hon. Member for Cork had deprecated that which he believed might possibly occur, and that he was fully alive to the very great difficulties which disorder and outrage might bring to his policy if they occurred during the coming months in Ireland. He would point out that nobody denounced outrage more than O'Connell did. O'Connell expressed his opinion that outrages were most detrimental to the cause which he had at heart; but, at the same time, he was unable, with all his great influence, to prevent occurrences which he disapproved of, and which did harm to his cause. They must not, therefore, be surprised if things occurred in Ireland which the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends disapproved of, and which would be detrimental to their interests. He would remind the Leaders of the Irish Party that the field of argument on the Irish Question had not yet been exhausted—it was not yet at an end, it was at its very beginning—and he and others on that side of the House still entertained confident hopes that the Party with which they were associated would be able to persuade the people of England of the justice of the cause which they had undertaken. Already many of the difficulties which had stood in the way of the Liberal Party at the last General Election had been removed, and others were in course of removal. He believed the greatest difficulty which they had met with was the Land Purchase Bill. His belief was that apart from the Land Purchase Bill the Liberal Party would have carried the Local Government Bill. He was sure that the Local Government Question was handicapped.

Mr. YERBURGH (Chester): Sir, I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is keeping himself to the Amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I see no cause yet to interfere.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the subject to which he was alluding was included in the Amendment. He repeated that one of the difficulties which they met with at the last Election was the difficulty raised by the Land Purchase Bill. That measure might or might not be necessary; but, at all events, it was unpopular, and it enabled their opponents to raise every possible subject of prejudice against it, and exaggerate it into something of the greatest magnitude. No one was more willing to do this than the Leaders of the so-called Liberal Unionist Party. His right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham was one of those who most freely made use of this prejudice against the Bill. The difficulty raised by that Bill had now been removed out of their way, because they found that the present Government was prepared to propose a measure at least as large if not larger than the Land Bill of the late Government. The criticisms of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham would not have had the same effect in the country if he had been candid enough to say during the General Election what he said in the debate on Thursday night—that he was himself in favour of a large scheme of Land Purchase for Ireland, and also in favour of the gradual substitution of peasant proprietors for the present dual ownership of land in Ireland. Such a scheme as that would practically involve the purchase of all the rights of the landlords in respect of the tenant holdings in Ireland; and therefore the present policy of the Government practically involved a scheme of Land Purchase larger by far than that of the late Government. He thought it would only have been fair and candid on the part of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham if he had given to the country during the last Election his opinions upon this subject. If he had told the country, at the time he was denouncing the Bill of the late Government, that he was himself favourable to a large scheme of Land Purchase, he believed that the main force of his right hon. Friend's argument against the Home Rule Bill would have been lost, and that there would have been much greater success for the Home Rule policy. His right hon. Friend, however, was not prepared to tell the country his views at the last Election, and concealed his opinions. His right hon. Friend had told them that there were Members of the Liberal Party who were endeavouring to ostracize him and to oust him from the Party. He must say that he was not aware that any Members of the Party entertained such a wish. They all had too high an opinion of the right hon. Gentleman's talent and capacity to wish him to be otherwise than a Member of the Liberal Party. His right hon. Friend had wandered from the great majority of the Liberal Party, and this by his own wish and course rather than by any wish of the Liberal Party. During the General Election he had said many things which had given his former friends great pain. He referred especially to the attempts he had made to raise the religious question in a way—

MR. SPEAKER: The general action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham at the General Election has no reference to the subject of the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he accepted the ruling of the Chair. He felt that if the country had been aware that the late Conservative Opposition and his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham were in favour of a large scheme of Land Purchase, much of the difficulty the Liberals met with in the recent campaign would have been avoided; and it was his confident belief that a very much larger number of the electors would have given their favour to the Irish policy of the late Government, and they might even have been returned with a majority. For his part, he was opposed to any gigantic scheme of Land Purchase, such as the one proposed by the Government, whether connected with Home Rule or not. But if connected with Home Rule, such a measure would be infinitely preferable to the other, inasmuch as autonomy would give content to Ireland; whereas unconnected with Home Rule the only effect of it would be to substitute an alien Government for the landlords in relation to the tenants. At the same time, while opposed to any scheme involving the purchase of all the land of Ireland and the expropriation of the landlords, he should not object to a moderate scheme which would assist the landlords to some extent, as was proposed by the late Government, provided the sum advanced was carefully limited in amount to some £40,000,000 or £50,000,000. But anything like a general expropriation of the landlords, which was apparently aimed at by the present Government, he considered to be dangerous and inexpedient. Unfortunately, the immediate crisis was not merely a political one—it was also an economic one. It was not seriously denied in any quarter that the great fall of prices of agricultural produce, especially so far as Ireland was concerned, in the last two years had most seriously affected the condition of the Irish tenants. There was one point connected with this to which he would specially call attention, as it had not yet been noticed. He alluded to the condition of the cottier tenants in the West and South of Ireland. This class was not directly affected by the fall of prices, for they consumed almost all that they produced; they were not, strictly speaking, farmers—they were labourers cultivating small plots of land for their own food, and finding employment in England or Scotland during three or four months of the year, and they returned carrying with them £10 to £15, out of which they hoped to pay their rents and help to provide a livelihood during the remainder of the year. The agricultural depression in England had affected these people in this way—that the market for their labour had failed them, and that they were without employment, and, as a consequence, a large body of these small tenants in Ireland during the last two or three years had been thrown on their beam-ends, and were totally unable to pay their rents. Everyone would admit that their case was one calling for grave consideration. He asked the Government and the House seriously to consider the position of this class of people. Was it right that in consequence of circumstances over which they had no control, and which had deprived them altogether of the means of paying their way—was it right that they should be subjected to ejectment from their holdings? He said it would not be right. It seemed to him that, looking to the unexpected nature of the calamity which had fallen on these men, their condition deserved the most serious consideration of the Government, and something ought to be devised to save them from general eviction. He recollected when the Land Act of 1881 was under consideration suggesting to the late Mr. W. E. Forster that a clause should be introduced into it similar to the provision to be found in the jurisprudence of many foreign countries, giving to the Courts of Law power to suspend evictions in the case of the very small tenants upon equitable terms in the event of any unforeseen calamity occurring rendering them unable to pay rent; but the Government was unwilling to raise the question, and his right hon. Friend said that when such a difficulty should occur Parliament must deal with it at the time. It was his belief that this question must now be dealt with if we were not to have disorder in the districts he referred to. When they came to the case of other tenants, of those who were strictly speaking farmers, living only by the land, the case was different. He was glad to find himself in agreement with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham on this point. If it were the fact that since the fixing of the main body of the judicial rents prices had fallen from 20 to 30 per cent, and if the fall was likely to be a permanent one, then it was clear that a strong case existed for consideration. It was said that the Commissioners must have taken into account the possibilities of a fall. He presumed they went upon some plan of average prices in the past; but the subsequent fall had been, he believed, altogether beyond any experience in the past. The Government, however, had already admitted that there was a prima facie case for inquiry. He would frankly admit that the subject was a difficult and a delicate one; it must be entered upon with consideration to both parties. What he wished to urge upon the Government was the extreme importance of coming to an early decision upon this subject. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) had said that he hoped the Commission would report at the end of next spring; but he would ask whether it was really necessary that there should be this long interval? The subject, though a difficult one to decide upon, was not one involving a long inquiry. He ventured to think that a Royal Commission sitting for a month in Dublin, after examining the Land Commissioners and ascertaining from them the general basis of their decisions, and after taking the evidence of competent persons upon the actual present prices of produce and the prospects of the future, might easily come to an early Report on this part of the case before the winter set in, and before proceedings became necessary for the collection of the November rents. He desired to emphasize what had been said by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). That right hon. Gentleman had said that the appointment of the proposed Commission would raise great difficulties between landlords and tenants with regard to the November rents, inasmuch as the landlords would be unwilling to make an immediate reduction for fear of prejudicing their case before the Commission. He might have added that the tenants would probably be unwilling to pay their rents for the very same reason. There would, therefore, be difficulties on both sides, which, unless they were dealt with at an early date, would probably be increased, rather than diminished, by the appointment of a Royal Commission. It was urgently necessary in the interests of both that the question, having been raised and being admitted as one proper for inquiry, should be set at rest as soon as possible. There could be no reason why the inquiry should be a long one. On this point the Commission might make an early Report. If their Report should involve legislation the responsibility would rest upon the Government for legislating at the earliest opportunity. In any case, the Report would have an important effect upon voluntary arrangements between landlords and tenants. If disorder was to be avoided in Ireland during the coming winter, he felt sure it could only be prevented by producing this Report, and, if possible, legislating in accordance with it. He would, therefore, urge upon the Government the immediate appointment of the Commission, and the promise that they should report on this branch of the subject before the winter set in. If they did not, he should have himself the gravest alarm as to what might happen. If the Government would not give any undertaking on their part, he should feel it his duty to enter a protest by voting with the hon. Member for Cork. He would not on this occasion enter upon any defence of the Land Act of 1881. He would merely point out that whatever method of dealing with the Land Question had then been adopted the subsequent fall of prices would have equally interfered with its successful working; if a universal system of peasant proprietors had been carried out by means of State loans there would now be the same outcry against the interest payable to the State as against the rents. The Land Act did not create a system of dual ownership—it only gave legal sanction and security to a system which in fact existed, and under which the tenants had acquired an interest in their holdings, which, under the then state of the law, was liable to be confiscated. The danger of dual ownerships of land in Ireland was not an economic one, but a political one; and, in his opinion, so long as England refused the demand of the Irish for self-government, so long would the landlords be connected in the minds of the people with that refusal, and would be considered as the impediments to Home Rule. The bad relations of landlord and tenant and every other bad symptom in Ireland were all intimately connected with the question of self-government. They might drive disaffection below the surface by sending a General to act the part of a policeman. They might bribe the tenants into becoming owners by extravagant terms of State loans; they might sweeten the pill of refusal by such treacle as money for material improvements; but they would have done little or nothing to establish the social system of Ireland on a sure and stable basis until they had recognized that its people were the best judges of what they wanted, and the only persons to whom the maintenance of order could be properly trusted.

Mr. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, fault had been found with the Government on the ground of delay; but, in his opinion, what they asked for was most reasonable, looking at the unfortunate condition of things that prevailed in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had made very large assumptions with regard to what he believed to be the policy of the Government. The landlords of Ireland did not wish to appear before the country as beggars, and they did not wish to throw any increased taxation on England. They were very well contented to remain in the position they occupied, provided they were left in secure occupation of the rights which were supposed to be guaranteed to them by recent legislation. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had said that the result of the late Election was largely affected by the Land Purchase Scheme of the late Government; but they should recollect that that scheme was repudiated, not only by hon. Members opposite, but by many hon. Gentlemen who sought to get seats in the House, and who failed. He thought, therefore, that the argument that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and his followers were defeated in consequence of the Land Bill could not be sustained. The right hon. Member for Bradford had referred to the cottier tenants of the West of Ireland. He presumed he referred to the small tenants, who were under, say, £5 valuation. A large number of those came over to England every year for the purpose of being engaged as agricultural labourers—for the purpose of supplementing their means of livelihood; and, no doubt, they earned a considerable portion of their rents in that way. He had not seen, however, that the migration of those tenants from the West of Ireland to the agricultural districts of England had been less this year than usual; and, therefore, the argument that they could not pay their rent in consequence would not hold good. He was not aware of any circumstances in England that prevented them from earning the usual amount of wages they took back to Ireland. It was to be regretted, of course, that the tenants should be obliged to have recourse to these extraneous exertions in order to be able to pay their rent; but that was a difficulty—and it had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian—over which the best of Irish landlords really had no control. ["Hear, hear!"] The remedy, and he believed the only remedy, to be applied to Ireland was emigration. That idea was at one time entertained by even the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his followers. It was proposed to obtain from the State very large assistance for the purpose of migrating. It was an exaggeration to describe the landlords in the way they had been by the Nationalists. The speech of the hon. Member for Cork was throughout an echo of the Chicago Convention. The hon. Member for Cork and his followers were determined to reject the measures the Government proposed to take, and which he believed were, in the opinion of the country, best calculated to advance the interests of the Irish farmers and of all classes in Ireland. The tenour of the speeches of those hon. Members had been the inability of tenants all over Ireland to pay their rents, and the assumed determination of their landlords to extort the last penny. He denied that the Irish landlords, as a body, would do anything of the sort; but, at the same time, so much bitterness had been introduced into the relations between landlord and tenant in a large proportion of the country that he admitted that it was almost hopeless to expect a restoration of the amicable relations which formerly existed between them. No language had fallen, either from the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) in that House, or from the Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury) in "another place," upon which could be based any charge of inciting the Irish landlords to act harshly in obtaining payment of rent. The truth was that the policy now taken up by the hon. Member for Cork and his adherents was not so much for the protection of the interests of the tenants in Ireland, as in systematic furtherance of aims, which, at one time or another, had been avowed by Members of the Party. Speaking at Boston in 1881, Mr. Healy said that they believed that landlordism was the prop of English rule in Ireland, and they worked to get rid of it. He went on to draw a comparison between the temptation of our Saviour and the presence of the English in Ireland, and said that the Irish, when shown all the Kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, instead of saying "Begone Satan," cried out "Begone Saxon." As to the prices of agricultural produce, statistics showed that prices in 1885 were almost exactly the same as they were in 1879, and the Commissioners must have had the latter before them when they fixed the judicial rents. He did not deny that the Parnellite Party represented the greater part of Ireland, but they did not represent it all; and he knew that in his district, though the farmers complained of the depression, they looked to a different source for a remedy. They looked to some protection from foreign competition. The system advocated by the hon. Member for Cork of a triennial settlement of rents would lead to more confusion than existed at the present time in the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and would be extremely disastrous to the agricultural interests of that country at large. He had, from long experience and observation, become perfectly acquainted with the character of the Irish landlords as a class, and was well assured that, unless there were a combination not to pay rent, they would not resort, except at the last extremity, to eviction. It would, undoubtedly, be to himself and those hon. Members from Ireland on the same side of the House a sincere pleasure if, either by the inquiries the Government were about to make, or in consequence of any suggestions which might be made from any quarter of the House in answer to those inquiries, the period of distress, pressure, and strain which had been placed on the relations between the landlords and tenants of Ireland should be removed. The question of the Irish Land Laws was a very difficult and complex one, and he was not prepared to say that it was easy at this moment to know exactly in what direction to proceed; but he believed that proceeding in the direction of a gradual and cautious development of the Land Purchase Act passed last year afforded the safest solution.

Mr. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) said, it was not his intention to have spoken in the debate if it had not been for some words which had fallen from one or two of the speakers that evening. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) deprecated any attempt to transfer the loss on rents from the owners of the land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland. A more unsound and dangerous policy than that propounded by the Government it was difficult to understand or conceive, because it proposed to transfer the losses of the Irish landlords to the State, than which nothing could be more utterly unfair. If it was a wise policy to make good the losses of Irish landlords, why should not the losses of English, Scotch, and Welsh landlords also be made good by the taxpayers of the United Kingdom? Whatever might be the condition of the Irish tenant farmers, one thing he could say was that the position of the Welsh tenant farmer was bad enough. From his own personal knowledge of the hilly portion of Wales—and the hilly portion was the largest—the tenant farmers would be unable to pay their rents during the coming winter, not owing to their own fault, but owing to the reduced value of the farms. If it was quite fair to make good the losses sustained by landlords in agricultural enterprises, why not make good the losses in connection with commercial and industrial undertakings? Surely what would be fair in one case would be equally fair in the other. Land in England and Wales was undergoing a similar depreciation to what it was undergoing in Ireland. It was not impossible that the land might recover its former value, or, it might be, that the returns from land might still further continue to be a languishing quantity. Therefore, the landlords ought to bear their losses in the same way that the ironmaster, the manufacturer, the colliery owner, and every suffering interest had to bear theirs. Many thousands of the working classes in this country at the present moment were famishing; and if the policy of the Government were to be carried out, there were toiling millions in this country who would have to bear the cost of such a policy. He was sorry to see that the policy of the Prime Minister in regard to this great subject had found the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain). The Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork deprecated any attempt of this kind. Yet the right hon. Gentleman was going to give the policy of the Government a fair and favourable consideration. Nay, what was more, he was going to vote for the ridiculous proposals of the Government. When the supporters of the Government and those who were acting with the right hon. Gentleman combined, they could, of course, carry any proposal, for in the present Parliament it was useless to appeal to any Party to defeat them. He (Mr. Abraham) most sincerely and solemnly, on behalf of his constituents, and on behalf of thousands of Welsh working men, wished to enter his humble protest against any attempt to transfer from the landlords their losses to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland; and he also ventured to caution the Government against making any attempt in that direction, or else they would have reason to regret their dangerous proposal.

Mr. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's) said, the answer to the previous speaker's question, "Why should not the same rule as to making up the losses of the landlords be applied to England, Scotland, and Wales, as well as to Ireland?" was simple enough. The landlords of the United Kingdom had made no request for anything of the kind; and the landlords of the United Kingdom had not had their rents judicially guaranteed. It was rather a singular thing to find the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) posing as the friend of the British taxpayer. The hon. Member had never hesitated to sacrifice the interests of the British taxpayer when the interest of Ireland demanded it. The attitude of the hon. Member for Cork in this matter was highly interesting. For the first time, he evinced a tender solicitude for the British taxpayer, and the House might be pardoned for doubting the purity of the hon. Member's motives, seeing that, as first lieutenant to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), he had advocated the Land Purchase Bill of that right hon. Gentleman, which would have sacrificed the interests of the British taxpayer to the extent of £150,000,000. Of the many startling changes which had taken place within the last six months this was one of the most startling. The basis of the proposal for ignoring the judicial rent fixed under the Land Act of 1881 was the alleged inability of the tenant to pay, owing to the fall in the prices of agricultural produce; but it seemed to him that the premiss had not been conclusively proved. There had been no evidence to show that the fall in the price of oats, butter, and live stock was likely to be permanent. Indeed, the Reports showed that the prices of live stock were recovering. ["Oh, oh!"] There was, however, no evidence of such a fall in the prices of agricultural produce as would justify the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork; and, on the other hand, there was ample evidence that many tenants were paying their rent surreptitiously. The policy which the Government had shadowed forth was the policy of the Land Act of 1881, supplemented by the Arrears Act of 1882 and the Purchase Act of 1885. The basis of the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork was to ignore the judicial rents of 1881 on the ground that the tenants were unable to pay. He did not think that it had been proved in the course of the debate that that was the case, while, on the other hand, there was much evidence to the contrary effect. It was a very extraordinary thing that the hon. Member for Cork asked the House, in the interests of the British taxpayer, to depart from a policy inaugurated by the English statesman whom he held in the greatest favour. He thought the faint doubts he had expressed as to the purity of the hon. Member for Cork were considerably increased when they recollected these facts; and they were justified in other ways to doubt the sincerity of the attitude of that hon. Member and his followers. Was this Amendment a bona fide attempt to bring about a better state of things in Ireland? The hon. Member for Cork and his followers came to that House unallied to any Party—they came as Irish patriots—and by the verdict of the constituencies a Home Rule Parliament in College Green had been denied them. [Cries of "No!"] He appealed to the facts of the results of the General Election and the present constitution of the House. The Imperial Parliament must, therefore, take the Land Question in hand, for it could not be settled by an Irish Parliament in Dublin. Under these circumstances, what good would the Amendment do the Irish-American Party, suggesting, as it did, that the policy of the Land Act of 1881 should be interfered with before the present Government had prosecuted their inquiries upon the subject? As an independent Conservative, he asked the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) and his followers if they really desired justice for Ireland, or was it not rather the fact that by supporting the Amendment they declined to be conciliated except by a grant of independence, which was beyond the power of the present House to grant? There were, he took it, three courses open on the question of land, if they admitted, for the sake of argument, that the tenants in Ireland could not pay the judicial rent. The first course was that the landlords should proceed to evict when they could not get their rent, and that the Government should not interfere; the second course was to lower the judicial rents; and the third course was that the policy shadowed forth by Her Majesty's Government should be carried out—namely, that in cases where the tenants were really unable to pay these judicial rents some form of State-aided payment should be proposed, by which these tenants would be able to pay their rents and the landlords receive that to which they were entitled by recent legislation. As to the first course, he took it that it was not proposed by the Government in all its nakedness; but he might remark that it was a very curious thing that Ireland should be the only part of the United Kingdom in which men should be allowed to break through their legal obligations with impunity, and where contracts were to be looked upon as pie-crusts, made only to be broken. It seemed the second course involved the British taxpayers in more of that responsibility which the Land Act imposed upon them. That was a point which was very seldom mentioned. The Liberal Government and Parliament of 1880 passed the legislation by which the judicial rents were fixed, and that imposed a responsibility on the British taxpayers. The latter were, to a certain extent, responsible for the acts of that Government, and for the legislation which was the outcome of their policy, for by their Representatives they entered into a contract between landlords and tenants. Parliament, after passing such legislation, could not, except with very good reason, interfere with it again in the way suggested. Coming, therefore, to the last alternative, they did not yet know whether the British taxpayers would be burdened at all; but if they were they had the guarantee that it was not to bolster up a foreign country and to pay rents to alien landlords; but it was done on good security, on sound conditions, and to support the industry of an integral part of the United Kingdom. He opposed the Amendment because it was open to suspicion, because it suggested an unbusiness-like policy, and because it was decidedly premature.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) said, it was evident that many of the arguments addressed to the House founded on the sacred right of contract and on the faith of Britain ceased to have very much weight with anyone coming from the North of Ireland and representing the tenants there. They had never approved of the Act of 1860, by which Parliament, for the first time, made the relation between landlord and tenant one of contract. From that period they might date the commencement of the land agitation in Ireland in its acute form. There was one matter touched upon by the hon. Member for Rhondda

Mr. William Abraham) and the hon. Member for St. Helen's Mr. Seton-Karr, which had been used as dexterously in Ireland for the purpose of preventing Ulster tenants having fair play as it had been used in that House for the purpose of persuading hon. Members that the existence of the tenant right was an argument in favour of keeping up high rents in Ulster. They were constantly told that they ought not to seek to reduce rent in Ulster because a tenant right had been sold for 20 or 25 years' purchase. He wished to point out that the Land Commission had not only not taken into view future depression, but had absolutely refused to hear the tenants' advocates upon this subject. The very interest of the tenants of Ulster, which it was the intention of Parliament to protect, was used as an instrument to keep up the rack rent; but he could assure the Government that the tenants in Ulster would never agree to have their tenant right taken away. It could not fairly be urged that the present rent, which had been fixed without regard to future depression, should be maintained, because the result of such maintenance would be universal bankruptcy in Ulster. There was a consensus of agricultural opinion that the continuance of judicial rents was utterly impossible. Oats were the corn crop of Ulster, and Ireland produced one-third of the whole crop of the United Kingdom. As a grower, he knew that the price had fallen fully one-fourth. A shilling a stone used to be considered the retail price, and now it was 8d. He had sold a growing crop for less than £7 an Irish acre, and for the like crop he had formerly received £10 to £11. Twenty-five per cent was not the limit to which the price of inferior cattle had fallen; some descriptions had fallen as much as 50 per cent. A fall of one-fourth in the price of produce ought to involve a reduction of fully one-half in the rent. It was quite a fallacy to suppose that a fall in prices was represented by an equal reduction in rent. That would transfer the burden to the tenant, instead of dividing it with the landlord. The 13th section of the 3rd clause of the Land Act of 1881 did not afford to tenants under non-judicial rents any remedy against evictions. The statement that it did would not be made in Ireland when the facts were known. The costs of applications to the Courts amounted to a large proportion of the rent due, and most of the few applicants had been refused any delay, unless landlords or their solicitors would consent, and unless they would impoverish themselves to an extent which would prevent them going on at all. He would suggest a remedy for the immediate future, and the principle of it was to be found in the suggestions which had been made from the Government Bench as to the suspension of evictions. It had been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), that certain tenants could have evictions suspended pending the consideration and reductions which were sought for by applying to the Court. He would develop that, and make it possible to prevent and defeat ejectments if the landlord refused a reasonable offer—say, two-thirds of the rent. He had heard it stated that reductions would be universal, and that the spirit of the landlords was to smooth matters over. He would leave it to the landlord to proceed under civil bill in the ordinary way for the remaining third, and allow the Court to decide whether, under the circumstances, it would allow a decree. He had himself considerable experience of the Courts in the North of Ulster, and he could say there never was a period when the disposition of the people was greater than it was now to put an end to the long struggle.

Mr. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, the hon. Member for North Donegal who had just sat down (Mr. O'Doherty) had not wasted the time of the House; and he and others who had addressed the House from the Irish Benches left on his (Mr. Powell's) mind the conviction that this Amendment would not meet the case, but that what was required was further inquiry and deeper investigation. He regretted that reference had been made to the Chicago Convention. He condemned the strong language which had been used at that Convention, and feared that if outrages were to occur in Ireland the warmth of the present relations between England and America might somewhat diminish. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had mentioned that when he was a boy there were disturbances in Lancashire. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was at school there.] No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was devoting himself so closely to his historical studies that he had not inquired very closely into the disturbances. Speaking from personal knowledge, he asserted that any disturbance which occurred in Lancashire had no connection with the repeal of the Corn Laws. It had been stated again and again by those who took a leading part in that movement, and by no one more emphatically than the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), that the repeal of the Corn Laws was a peaceful movement, and that no outrages took place from the beginning of the discussions to the end. No population in the world had suffered so severely as that of Lancashire did from the Cotton Famine. But there was no disturbance during that crisis. There was peace and order, and he might say even contentment, and perhaps happiness. The people of Lancashire passed through that crisis, if not without anxiety as regarded the welfare of the people, without a moment's alarm as to disturbance. What was the result of that action on the minds of the people of the country at large? When it was proposed to confer the borough franchise it was argued that the people who could behave in that way and show so much self-restraint were worthy of possessing the suffrage. It was clear, therefore, that no disturbance was necessary, in this country at least, to accomplish a wholesome reformation. The next point referred to by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) in his Amendment was the objection made to the transfer of loss from the owners of land by any extension of State-assisted purchase. Some anxiety had been expressed as to whether the English taxpayer would be saddled with an additional burden arising from grants of Imperial money to Irish landlords. It was necessary, therefore, for Conservative Members to make their position on that point clear and distinct. In the earlier portion of the year he opposed the proposal of the late Government for the purchase of land, because he was convinced, after full investigation, that the security was not a valid one, and that, in the end, great loss would be incurred by English taxpayers. But in this case, so far as he could gather from the declarations of the Government, it was no part of their plan that there should be a farthing of loss to the British taxpayer. It was upon that conviction that he and his hon. Friends from Lancashire would give support to the Government in the proposals which they had foreshadowed. Hon. Members from Ireland had a great deal to say about Irish poverty. He regretted that those declarations of poverty should be made, because they were a great weakening of the power of Ireland. It was manifest that a nation which was in the poor condition which hon. Members represented could not be in the enjoyment of credit. Ireland wanted more ample resources and larger means, in order that by taking advantage of them capital might remain in the country, be made to increase, and attracted to it. If Ireland was to take its place among the nations of the world—to use the phrase of hon. Gentlemen opposite—if it was to have a place in the industrial and commercial communities of civilization, there must be more wealth introduced in the country. The declarations of want of means, therefore, were an injury to Ireland; they impaired confidence, and were calculated to impair the resources of that country. They also heard a great deal about the wealth of Irish landlords. But talk of that kind was not justified by the facts. In reality, so far as his observation went, the bulk of Irish landlords were poor. He should like to see among Irish tenants, not only the ability and the willingness to pay their rents, but a willingness to work with a will and with skill. He was by no means convinced, from what he had seen of Ireland, and from what he had read in connection with the condition of the country, that the very best was made of the agricultural resources of that country. If the minds of the agricultural population were withdrawn from political controversy and more firmly fixed on the cultivation of the land, he believed that there would be more prosperity, greater wealth, and more happiness in Ireland. He hoped they would soon have tranquillity and order in Ireland, and that the intellectual force of the Government and the mental and physical energies of the House of Commons would be directed to a solution of the problem unimpaired by the heat of bitter controversy, and uninterrupted by manifestations of hostile feeling towards a country which was most desirous of serving Ireland.

Mr. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) said, he was desirous of expressing his sympathy with the cause of Ireland. He regretted that the question had led to a division in the Liberal ranks, and that the landmarks of the Party had been broken up. So far from regarding the dissident section of the Party as Unionists, he thought they ought to be called Confusionists, who would find themselves in a very peculiar position whenever they had to return to the constituencies for re-election. With regard to the Amendment, he submitted that the depression in prices, which was patent to the whole world, was likely to be permanent. They could not exaggerate too much the facilities which were given in the present day by the telegraph and the various lines of steamers and otherwise for the carrying of produce from one country to another. As 100 tons of produce could be carried for 1*d.* per mile by sea, exclusive of handling expenses, the House could easily imagine what effect such rates must have in the bringing of produce from abroad. From the River Plate, as well as from New Zealand, we were receiving a large quantity of mutton, which was one of the staple articles of produce in Ireland. He would give a few statistics, just to show what had been the progress and increase of the shipment of frozen meat to this country. In 1882 the quantity imported was, in round numbers, 189,000 cwt.; in 1883, 286,000 cwt.; in 1884, 303,000 cwt.; and in 1885, 372,000 cwt. Those figures represented an increase in value from £637,000 in 1882 to £1,186,000 last year. Those facts were taken from the Board of Trade Returns, and could not be challenged; and he found from the Report of July that we were now receiving also considerable shipments of frozen mutton from the Falkland Islands. He learned from friends interested in the shipping trade that arrangements were being made on most of the chief lines of steamers now running to mutton-producing countries for frozen compartments to be provided, in order to bring mutton to England from all parts of the world; and he found there were now in this country 26,000 carcasses at the Victoria Docks and 20,000 at the West India Docks, making a total of 46,000 carcasses at the present moment in London. Of course, this supply was likely to increase, and he hoped landlords opposite would take such facts into consideration before attempting to evict their Irish tenantry at a time of unusual depression. He thought all who had studied this question must be heartily sick of the application of coercion, which had been perfectly useless and provocative of crime. The fatal sisterhood of coercion, eviction, and outrage had followed upon one another's heels. Coercion could not be applied to the Irish people without arousing feeling which led to outrages, which the Irish Members must deplore as being the greatest enemies to the cause of self-government. He was bound to confess that some years ago he also believed in the policy of coercion, and had signed a Memorial in 1880 from the borough he now represented urging the Government to take whatever steps they thought necessary for the restoration of order in Ireland. In course of time many of them changed their opinions. Probably they did not study Irish history until the question became urgent; but they might save themselves the expense of investing in a history of Ireland by recognizing the fact that it was one long history of outrage by England for the last 700 years. It was to be feared that the landlords would follow the advice which had been given to them by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) to evict their tenants, knowing that they would be fully protected. It was difficult for those who sat on that—the Government—side of the House to propose any legislation which could be exactly agreeable to the Irish Members below the Gangway, who not only desired self-government for Ireland, but were in favour of the large scheme promoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). To that scheme he had given an unswerving support, although he did not pledge himself to the land measure introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. Therefore, he had no need to act upon the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), and separate himself from the main body of the Liberal Party. In addressing the House for the first time he wished to express his extreme sympathy with the cause of Ireland, and to assure Irish Members that there were many sitting on the Benches above the Gangway who would work heartily to aid them in carrying out the great object which they advocated and had at heart. In conclusion, he desired to express his thanks to the House for the courtesy with which they had heard him.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford) said, he felt some difficulty about giving a silent vote on the present occasion. And, first of all, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he made a remark chiefly of a personal character. He regretted that he should have been some few days ago—for the first time in 21 years—called to Order. So long as he had had a seat in that House he had never been called to Order from the Chair until that occasion, when he rose to protest against a statement of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). The hon. Member for Cork stated in his place that Lord Carnarvon went over to Ireland as a Home Ruler, and that he did so with the knowledge of his Chief Secretary. Now, Lord Carnarvon had dealt with statements of this nature amply and fully again and again in "another place," and the noble Lord was perfectly able to take care of himself. But, for himself, he (Sir William Hart Dyke) wished, and was determined, to take the earliest opportunity of giving the most unqualified contradiction to the statement of the hon. Member that the English language could convey. It was right, further, to state this—that the very first knowledge, or even inkling of knowledge, that came to him that an interview had taken place between Lord Carnarvon and the hon. Member for Cork was some six months after he had resigned the Office of Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had in his possession a letter from the Earl of Carnarvon, written on the 13th of June last, in which the noble Earl gave ample reasons how it was and why it was—that that interview took place solely on the noble Earl's own responsibility and totally apart from any of his Colleagues in the Government—that he withheld all knowledge of it from his Chief Secretary. It might be urged that these matters, being personal, were of infinitesimal importance, having regard to the grave subjects raised in the debate; but, at the same time, he did not apologize for introducing them. The Office of Chief Secretary had never been a bed of roses to its occupants, although whoever took that charming position must be willing to accept all responsibility attaching to it. He noticed that whilst his Successor (Mr. John Morley) still occupied a seat down there on the Front Opposition Bench, he himself, with singular immodesty, as an ex-Chief Secretary, had at once taken a higher position in the House. Passing now to one or two matters that had emerged in the course of the debate, he was bound to say that, having listened with some careful attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), he found it, in a certain sense, one of the most difficult speeches to reply to that he had ever heard. The hon. Member for Sligo had travelled very far in his speech; and though many hon. Members might endeavour to follow him in what he had said, yet he believed that hon. Members on both sides of the House would endorse his statement that though that speech had been amusing in itself, and contained light personalities, yet he defied any candid man to say he could extract from it any solid argument why the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork should be accepted by the House, and the policy of Her Majesty's Government repudiated. It was true that the House had had a long and entangled discussion; and he, for one, pitied the Speaker during it. During all the time he had been in Parliament he had never known any occupant of the Chair who had had so much difficulty in dealing with his flock, and in stopping those sheep who wandered from the fold; but for his own part, if he should follow in the steps of previous wanderers, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman (the Speaker) that he would "downcharge" at the lifting of his little finger. This discussion, though somewhat lengthened, had not proved a useless one, either as regarded the position of Her Majesty's Government or of the House in general. During its progress they had discovered various things that were of value both to hon. Members of that House and to the constituencies of the country. In the first place, they had learned this from the careful and able speech of the hon. Member for Cork—that he and those who were now acting with him were prepared to say non possumus to any measure that the Government might propose for the material amelioration of Ireland, so long as they did not accept his formula of an independent Parliament sitting in Dublin. He did not think he was exaggerating what had been the meaning of that speech. It was of value to the House, and still more to the constituencies of this country, to gather for the first time that any measure proposed by the people of this country, or the Parliament of this country, for the amelioration of Ireland would be rejected unless the constituencies of this country were prepared to go back upon the course which they had adopted with so much decision a few months ago, and to accept the proposition of an Irish Parliament. They had learned another thing of equal value—the treatment that they on that side of the House were likely to receive in these Irish difficulties from the Front Opposition Bench. They had had a very long speech with reference to this Amendment from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). That speech had been a critical one; and though its language and manner had been very mild, yet he must say that the impression which that speech had left on his mind, and on the minds of those who sat on his side of the House, was that it conveyed an earnest desire to make the task of those who had succeeded the right hon. Gentleman as difficult and as thorny as possible. For his own part, he had heard with the greatest regret much that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman with reference to this difficulty of the collection of rents in Ireland, considering the authority with which the right hon. Gentleman spoke. The impression which that speech had left on his mind was that, though the right hon. Gentleman had not asked the tenants of Ireland not to pay rent, he had given them a hint very much like that conveyed in the intimation—"Do not nail his ears to the pump." At the conclusion of his speech, the right

hon. Gentleman had stated that the great difficulty with regard to the whole question was that, while England was governed according to English ideas and Scotland according to Scottish ideas, Ireland, on the other hand, was not in these matters governed according to Irish ideas. He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues followed that statement to its logical conclusion? Were they prepared to adopt the language which they heard upon the Irish Benches with regard to slavery in Ireland, when the fact that a man was compelled to meet the legal obligations into which he had entered was spoken of as slavery? On the very night when the right hon. Gentleman was making his speech upon the question in that House a speech had been made at a League meeting in Dublin by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Tuite), in which he had told his audience that—

"The tenants must see, and the Irish people must see, that the land from which a tenant might be cast out must be made for every other man a curse instead of a blessing."

That was the programme of an hon. Member who sat below the Gangway; was it endorsed by his Colleagues on those Benches? If it were so, the sooner the people of this country knew it the better.

MR. TUIITE (Westmeath, N.): As one of the Members for Westmeath, I deny having used such language.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, N.): As the other Member for Westmeath, I also deny having used the words.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: The words were reported as having been used by one of the Members of that Party; and the question was whether the late Prime Minister and his Colleagues endorsed such language? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had somewhat patronized the Government with regard to the difficulties in which they were placed, and had spoken of the complex question before them. The whole question was, indeed, complex and complicated enough; but what was the chief source of these complications? He held that the chief source of them was the past land legislation of the right hon. Gentleman. Speech after speech had been made in this debate from both sides of the House full of bitter denunciation of the policy of the Land Act of the right hon. Gentleman; and the complications which the right hon. Gentleman now talked of were the result of measures which had been denounced at their introduction, and which now had borne bitter fruit. The right hon. Gentleman himself had produced the worst complication of all when he had performed one of the biggest political somersaults ever executed by a British statesman. With regard to the great questions of evictions and the payment of rent raised by the hon. Member for Cork, for his own part he knew something about these difficulties. He would point out to the House that, while Her Majesty's Government were denounced from the Benches opposite because they asked for a Commission of Inquiry, every speech made in that debate proved not only that such an inquiry was necessary, but that any legislation attempted without it must inevitably fail. No statement had been made from his own side of the House with regard to this great Land Question which had not immediately been contradicted by hon. Members opposite; and he might also say that there were very few statements which had been made over there which had not been amply contradicted on his own side. That amply proved the necessity which existed for the inquiry which Her Majesty's Government demanded; and he held that unless the Government proceeded in that way it would be utterly impossible for them to carry out any legislation whatever. With regard to these evictions, he was not one of those who would regard with honour any man who dealt harshly or bitterly with tenants who could not pay. Those, however, who had been watching this question considered—whether rightly or wrongly—that there were many cases at this moment in Ireland where tenants were in difficulties and could not pay their rent; but they had also discovered that there were two classes, and they wanted an inquiry in order to discriminate between the two. There was a class of tenants who were in grave difficulties, and were unable to pay their rents. But there was a vast class, on the other hand, who were trading on the difficulties and disasters of their fellow-tenants, and who could pay and would not. Therefore, to ask Her Majesty's Government to go into some wholesale scheme for the relief of Irish tenants was most unjust and impolitic. Hon. Gentlemen talked as if this Land Question was merely an Irish one, and they ignored the sufferings of the English tenants. It was not an Irish question only. In England during the last 10 years there were thousands of farmers who had become bankrupt, and who had suffered without a murmur; and were we to tell them, as a reward for their loyalty and patience, that for them nothing would be done, while we were giving an ample measure of relief by State machinery to a huge number of Irish tenants who could pay and would not do so? He wished to urge that consideration in common justice when he heard those long denunciatory harangues against the British Parliament, and all those speeches about the impossibility of arranging our affairs without the intervention of two Parliaments. Why was the Land Purchase Act of 1885 so persistently ignored by hon. Gentlemen opposite? That was said to be the most liberal Act ever passed as regarded the tenants. It proposed to make the Irish tenant in 49 years absolute owner of his holding, relieved of all charges whatever except taxes. How was it that this Act had been left until now, with slight exceptions, practically inoperative? He could see when he went back to Ireland after the passing of the Act that it was frowned upon and its operation was blocked by the National League in Ireland. [Cries of "No!"] He stated facts which came before him. When he was in Dublin he had case after case mentioned to him where the tenants would have taken advantage of the Act; but a hint was given them that for the present, at all events, the Act was to remain inoperative. It had been urged that the judicial rents had been fixed without any regard to a future fall in prices. But it was impossible for any man who had been connected with land even for six weeks not to have brought to his notice what the fall in prices was likely to be. He maintained that the prospective fall in prices must have been taken into account by the Sub-Commissioners in fixing the rents, or, if not, the Commissioners were utterly unfit for the task before them; but he believed that most of the decisions as to the judicial rents

were come to after three or four of the worst agricultural years which had been experienced in Ireland. He denied, moreover, that there had been such a fall in prices as it was sought to make out. As far as he understood the policy of the hon. Member for Cork, it was to shut up Ireland by herself, and restrict her from any trading operations with England. (Cries of "No!") They had heard it, but he trusted it was not so. Would Ireland be the better for it? When he was in Ireland in July, 1885, butter was selling in Cork at 7d. per lb. An hon. Friend of his rather depreciated the value of the article; but he was romancing at the time. At that very moment in his own country they could get 1s. 6d. per lb. for as much of that very butter as could be had. A charge had been constantly brought against Her Majesty's Government that under their scheme the taxpayers of this country were to be called upon to pay the difference between the judicial rent and that actually received by the landlords—so that they might not suffer. He had heard nothing from the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer to sustain such a charge, though he believed that by the Act of 1881 the State did take an enormous onus upon itself with regard to this question of rent, by its interference with freedom of contract between landlords and tenants. For himself, with regard to peasant proprietary, he did not believe that a complete system could be carried out for the benefit of Ireland. If it could be carried out fully it would be a good thing; but he did not believe in it, because there was a vast extent of land in Ireland on which the small occupier would be always on the verge of starvation. The rents of a great number of those small occupiers in the West of Ireland was not paid out of the land, but out of the wages of able-bodied members of the family, who came over to England for the harvest operations, saved their earnings, and took them back to pay the rent of their holdings. The labour question was not peculiar to Ireland—it extended to England also. At present the towns were being flooded by a large mass of the agricultural population, chiefly because a great extent of land was going out of cultivation; it was laid down in grass, and the labour accounts were reduced almost to nil. The consequence was a great pressure of labour in the large towns. And they proposed to remedy the evil by placing the whole of Ireland under one huge system of peasant proprietors. But how were they to live? In Galway, Mayo, and other counties there was a vast quantity of rock with bits of grass here and there where small holders could not subsist. Under a huge system of peasant proprietors they would put small squatters upon those patches, and the consequence would be that the evil would be aggravated. The certain result of the establishment of a peasant proprietary would be a misfortune rather than a blessing, for it would still more completely flood the labour markets of England with Irishmen, who would come over to earn the rents of their land during the harvest. Among the working classes of this country the effect of Irish legislation upon the labour question in this country had been regarded as of the greatest importance. He mentioned this point in perfect good faith, because, however much hon. Members in that House might differ upon political subjects, his earnest hope was that they would all do their best to prevent anything like a collision between the working classes of England and Ireland. He should like to conclude his remarks by one sentence, which was possibly out of Order; but he hoped that the indulgence of the House would be accorded to him on the ground that he had endeavoured to be good so far. He trusted that hon. Members from Ireland would agree that, whatever opposition he and those who thought with him might offer to the proposal for a separate Parliament for Ireland, they were all desirous to obtain that which they honestly believed would be for the good of that country. What he disliked so much in this debate was the assumption on the part of Irish Members that English Members who sat on the Government side of the House were animated by hostile feelings towards Ireland, and were desirous of retarding its progress and its prosperity. For his part, he repudiated any notion of the kind. He went further, and he wished that that identity of policy by successive Governments which had been so strongly approved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian as applied to the foreign policy of this country could be applied also to Ireland. He could not help thinking how different would have been the relations between Ireland and this country during the last 10 or 15 years if there had been something like a continuity of policy adopted towards Ireland by both Parties as they successively came into power. On this matter both Parties had been to blame. He confessed that he had been in former times as bitter a partizan as any man; but he now deeply regretted that Ireland should have been made the football between the contending Parties in the State, which was the reason why the Irish problem was now the most difficult that had ever vexed the souls of politicians. He desired, however, to address one word of warning to hon. Members opposite. We had lately passed through the trouble of an Election in this country; and he was satisfied that the verdict which had been given by the country, hostile to a separate Parliament for Ireland, would, if again challenged, be given in a manner ten times more strong than that which had just been delivered.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Sir, although I do not agree with several things which have been said by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, yet I think that most of us will agree with him when he said that every hon. Member in this House has the good of Ireland at heart. The object of a deliberative Assembly such as this is to secure the good of the commonwealth. I shall not detain the House long with any remarks I have to make upon the Amendment; but as the House has now heard speeches from all sections of it, from orthodox Conservatives, Irish Nationalists, orthodox Liberals, and hybrid Liberals, perhaps it is not out of place if a Radical unattached should give his view of the Amendment before the House. I may have had for a moment, perhaps, some misgiving whether the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) ought to be added to an Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne; but I can assure you, Sir, that all my doubts were entirely removed after I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). I speak impartially in the matter, because all of us know the attitude which the hon.

Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) took up in the General Election of 1885. The hon. Member put out a Manifesto to the constituency for which I was standing, directing them to vote against me, and the consequence was that I was kept out of the last Parliament. I appear here to-day to return good for evil; and the best return I can make is carefully to examine the Amendment which has been put on the Paper, and to give my unbiased opinion whether it ought to be carried or not. Now, the first clause of the Amendment declares that—

"Owing to the heavy fall in the price of agricultural produce, the greatest difficulty will be experienced in the coming winter by the Irish tenant farmers in the payment of their present rents, and that many will be unable to pay those rents at all."

That is admitted to be true by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The second clause naturally follows from the first. The second clause observes that in that state of things—

Well, Sir, that is the Irish Question. Eviction is almost the whole of the Irish Question as I understand it. In my heart I regard it as the Irish Question in its intensity. In Ireland—although we have had such difficulty in governing it, and we have not been able to govern it for the last 85 years—in Ireland, I believe, there is less ordinary crime than in almost any other country. And the question of evictions is really and truly at the bottom of the whole Irish Question. Then comes the third clause of the Amendment; and I do not understand that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham really objects even to that clause. The third clause says—

"That we deprecate any attempt to transfer the loss likely to arise due to inability to pay the present rents, from the owners of land to the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland, by any extension of State-assisted purchase on the basis of rents fixed when prices were higher than they now are."

I am very glad that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham approves of that also. But that is not the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. What does the right hon. Gentleman say?

Sir William Hart Dyke

He says that he does not consent that any money whatever shall be expended for that purpose. But when we take the declaration of Her Majesty's Government, not in this House, but "elsewhere," we find it most distinctly and positively asserted that the public money should be given to those landlords whose rents fall short. Then I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham whether his version of what the Government are going to do, or the Government's own version, is the correct one? The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not like to speak in this House of an absent man, who had no opportunity of giving an explanation. But I should like to ask if he has made any inquiry? Has he tried to get an explanation, or any correction, of the reported utterances of the Head of the Government? If not, he stands in the most peculiar position in which any statesman ever yet stood. For my part, I believe the Government when they say that they are going to pay the public money in recompense to those landlords whose rents fall short. I assume that that is their opinion still. If it is not their opinion, why do they not accept the Amendment now before the House? If they do not propose to give the money of the State to the landlords, let them say so. Let us not be put to the trouble of a division; but let them assert the principle which is contained in the Amendment. If the House is to go to a division I shall certainly give my vote in favour of the Amendment; because I shall believe that Her Majesty's Government, when they declare a particular thing, mean what they say. Now, Sir, I do not think this Amendment involves any difficult matter after all. I think it is easily understood; and I want to know what inducement there is for any real Liberal Member to vote against it at the instigation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? Why, the very fact that the right hon. Gentleman said he would oppose it is one of the reasons that would make me support it. Are the men who have been returned to this House by Tory votes to influence the conduct of Liberal Members? I trow not, Sir. They may assume what they like; they may say what they like; they may sit where they like; but they are Tories pure and simple. They are advocating Tory doctrines; they are supporting a Tory policy; and they are the great supporters of the Tory Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham says that he supports Her Majesty's Government. He either does not mean what he says, or he is going to support a policy which he himself says is most mischievous, and will be most disastrous to the country. He has told us that it would be one of the most unjust measures that could possibly be conceived, to make up by public money the loss to the Irish landlords. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should be in such a position. Certainly, he has taken very extraordinary courses lately. One hardly knows where to find him, or where to have him. He is like a man I heard of the other day—a farm servant—who took very eccentric courses, and did very extraordinary things. One day the farmer in whose service he was went into a barn, and found that the man had hanged himself. Looking at him with astonishment, he said—"I wonder what that man will do next!" The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has great confidence in the policy which he has declared to the House.

MR. GENT-DAVIS (Lambeth, Kensington): I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, if the hon. Baronet is in Order in pursuing that special line of argument?

MR. SPEAKER: I am following the hon. Baronet in order to see the application of his remarks.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I shall be happy to state, in a moment, the application of my remarks. I was telling a story about a man who had hanged himself, and the application was to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Baronet had better confine himself strictly to the Amendment before the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I will endeavour, Sir, to obey your ruling; but it is exceedingly difficult for me, or for any of us, to confine ourselves to the Amendment, after such a bad example as that which we have had from the right hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Dartford (Sir William Hart Dyke). But, Sir, I will confine myself strictly to the speech which was made by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham.

[Seventh Night.]

After he had described his policy at full length, the right hon. Gentleman said that he would pledge himself, if the Government appealed to the country on the subject, that the result would be similar to what it was at the last Election. That was the pledge the right hon. Gentleman gave. I will give no pledge; but I will give a promise. I say that the right hon. Gentleman will find himself very much mistaken. Does he remember what took place in 1885? Why did the Irish oppose the Liberal Party? [Cries of "Order!"] Am I to reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, or is he to speak in this House and is nobody to reply to him? I know that the right hon. Gentleman is the autocrat of Her Majesty's Government; but he is not the autocrat of this House, and we have a right to reply to whatever he says. I shall therefore reply to him, unless you, Mr. Speaker, say that he is infallible. [Cries of "Order!"] Well, I have done. All I say is, as I said before, that the right hon. Gentleman will find himself very much mistaken when he goes to the country next time. He will find that the country will overthrow one of the most mischievous and one of the most miserable political combinations which have ever been seen in this country, and which at present bars the way to the tranquillity of Ireland, and the real, genuine, and lasting union of the two nations.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Mr. Speaker, if I do not vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), it is not because I am in a position to deny any one of the statements that are contained in it. [Cries of "Oh!"] If I may be permitted to refer to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), so far I am in exactly the same position as he was. He stated that he agreed with every statement in the Amendment; but he said he was going to vote against it. Now, I am not going to do that, and therefore I do not go so far as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He had a very easy method of accounting for the course he was going to take, and although it is impossible that I can adopt it, it would very much facilitate all political action if his method were pursued. He said that he agreed with all the statements in the Amendment. [Cries of

"No, no!" His exact phrase was, that with regard to the statements in the Amendment he had no objection to make. ["No, no!"] That is the correct rendering of what my right hon. Friend said. ["No, no!"] It is precisely what he stated. ["No, no!"] At any rate, it can be verified at any time by a reference to the report of the speech of my right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he agreed with the Amendment; but whether he agreed with it or differed from it he was going to vote against it, for it would disturb the position of Her Majesty's Government. He said he felt bound to wait for the plans they had announced, and to give them a careful and favourable consideration. My right hon. Friend is not always in exactly that accommodating spirit. It is only about six or seven months ago, when the same Government was sitting in the same place, and my right hon. Friend was sitting much in the same place which he occupied last night, when a great friend and ally of his, now another of the Members for Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), brought forward an Amendment to the Address of the Government of that day. It was an Amendment which had reference to the Land Question, and it condemned the Government on the ground of their not having brought forward some satisfactory proposition with reference to the Land Question in England. The Government alleged, as they allege now, that they were going to legislate upon the subject, and that they were going to bring forward a plan with reference to the Land Question in England. [Cries of "Order!"] I think I am quite in Order—I am criticizing the course taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham on the Amendment by referring to his conduct with reference to a cognate subject. [Cries of "Order!"] I do not wonder that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin) is a little sensitive on that subject, because he played a distinguished part on that occasion.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in making reference to a debate which took place last Session, on a Motion moved in another Parliament, which has nothing whatever to do with the Amendment now under discussion?

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that his remarks had reference to a cognate subject.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If this contention is set up, I must say that I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cockermouth (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that it is preposterous that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham should, for an hour by the clock, stand here abusing all the Gentlemen among whom he sits, and yet that we are not to be allowed to reply to him. That is a contention which I confess would make Parliamentary life intolerable.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S. : I must rise to Order. [Cheers and cries of "Shame!" from the Home Rule Benches.] Mr. Speaker, I am bound, Sir, to ask you, in the interests of the order of debate in this House—"Oh, oh!"—whether the last remark of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was consistent with due respect to the Chair? ["Oh, oh!"] You yourself, Mr. Speaker, I will remind you, repeatedly called the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to Order during the course of his speech. You distinctly prohibited the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth from travelling beyond the limits of the Amendment, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite who is now leading the Opposition—"Order, order!"

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Sir, I rise to Order. [Home Rule cheers.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland : Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the noble Lord is in Order? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself risen to a point of Order. I call upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The noble Lord is making a speech.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In rising to a point of Order, the point of Order to which I feel bound in the interests of debate and the dignity of this House—"Oh, oh!"—to direct your attention is, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, by his last, remark has not distinctly questioned the ruling of the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: If I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly, he accuses the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby of having spoken of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham as abusing his Colleagues, and of infringing the dignity and order of the Chair. Of course, any interpretation of that kind would be quite out of Order, for if the right hon. Gentleman had transgressed I should have called him to Order. A further point of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified in following the course for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was called to Order. That I understand to be the question put to me by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I must say that I do not consider that when a right hon. Gentleman has pursued a course which has brought him under the notice of the Chair, and required him to be called to Order, the remarks he had made are a fit subject for subsequent discussion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It is not in my recollection that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham was called to Order for stating that he was about to support Her Majesty's Government under all circumstances. That was the remark upon which my observations were founded. Upon that I stated that that was not the course which the right hon. Gentleman had on all occasions followed; and I was also going to point out that, with reference to that course, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham had given his reasons, upon a former occasion, for not taking the same course which he said he would take on the present occasion. I was about to refer to what he had stated. He said, on the 26th of January—

"If it is asked why we have thought it necessary to support an Amendment hostile to the Government, and why we have not waited for the proposals they intend to make, we say that we support the Amendment because we have no confidence that the Government will either do justice to the agricultural labourer, or to any question with which they may have to deal."

Now, I say that that is a course which is not entirely consistent with the principle which the right hon. Gentleman laid down last night. Well, my right hon. Friend has stated that he is going to vote against this Amendment on account of the complete confidence he has in the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, and that he is going to support the Government in consequence of the complete distrust he has of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dartford (Sir William Hart Dyke) has said, it is well that some of these positions should be cleared up, and I think that they have been cleared up by this debate. Sir, I do not quite understand the tone in which my right hon. Friend addressed us last night. I do not understand the meaning of that extraordinary soreness which he seemed to display. He always speaks on these subjects to the Gentlemen among whom he sits as if he were sore all over. We have none of that feeling towards him. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, I can speak for myself; I have not. He addresses us in a tone very different from that of my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). My noble Friend, we are sorry to know, differs from us fundamentally upon the question of this Amendment. But he admitted frankly the other night that he did not claim to represent the majority of the Liberal Party. He claimed, of course, to exercise his own discretion in this matter, and to act upon his own judgment; but he did not presume to denounce the Liberal Party for their conduct. The noble Marquess did not, like the right hon. Gentleman, tell the Liberal Party that they would wander for 40 years in the wilderness until they cast themselves at his feet and adopted the principles which he has laid down. Well, Sir, we may have to wander in the wilderness. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Oh, yes; that happened to the "Chosen People" before they entered upon the Promised Land. But they did not follow the first man who invited them to go after the fleshpots of Egypt. Sir, it was the lot of the Liberal Party, at the end of the last and at the commencement of the present century, to wander for many years in the wilderness of Opposition on account of their fidelity to their principles, some of which were very closely connected with the Irish Question. Every species of prejudice was roused against them; and if my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham thinks that the Liberal Party of to-day are unequal to the sacrifices which were made in former days, and which are regarded as the most glorious period of their history, when they had to fight against the Tory Party and the seceding Liberals of those days, he will find he is very much mistaken. And if he thinks that by threats of exclusion from Office he can coerce us into a blind support of a Tory Government and a Tory policy, I can assure him that he does not understand the spirit of those Gentlemen with whom he has to deal. Whatever may be the case with my right hon. Friend, we at least claim the right to examine this Amendment upon its merits by the light of Liberal principles. Now, Sir, my right hon. Friend says that he has been ostracized by the Liberal Party. Why, Sir, I think it is rather the other way. He has ostracized the Liberal Party on his own single shell. That is my reply to the right hon. Gentleman; and I will now, Sir, go directly to the words of this Amendment. This Amendment deals, first of all, with the subject of rent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) complained of me the other day for what I had said upon the subject of rent. Now, I did not introduce the question of rent. What I said upon the subject was a commentary upon the language of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to rent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says that I have written up "no rent" and run away. I have done neither the one nor the other. I have not written up "no rent," and I have certainly not run away. I thought it necessary to point out the danger which would inevitably arise from the language employed by the noble Lord. I said I thought it was a provocation—whether so intended or not—of course, I judge no man's intentions, but I judge only the natural consequence of his words—and I said I thought it was in the character of a provocation to conflict. The noble Lord's language rather reminded me of an epigrammatic phrase which has been productive of such remarkable effects "elsewhere"—that what he said about rent might have been condensed into a single phrase—"The landlords will fight and the landlords will be right." I thought it necessary to point out that effect and to protest against the danger of language of that description. I am happy to say that that interpretation has been entirely repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I think, if the debate had only produced that result, it has not been without its use. I think the right hon. Gentleman fulfils a very useful part. Sitting by the noble Lord, he is always there to explain away the noble Lord, and to repair the occasional indiscretions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, Sir, this question of rent is urgent. It is admitted, as it is stated in this Amendment, that it has, and must have, a direct effect upon social order. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dartford said—"How comes this question to be complicated? How comes social order to be involved in rents? It is all in consequence of the legislation of the Party who sit on that side of the House." [Ministerial cheers.] Oh, yes; there never were any agrarian disturbances before the Land Act of 1870. Is it the right hon. Gentleman's experience, from his brief residence in Ireland as Chief Secretary, that agrarian disturbance and agrarian discontent and the evils of Ireland arose for the first time in 1881, or 1870? I think he has still something to learn, if he is of that opinion. But we are told by the Government—"We are going to have a Commission, and you ought to wait for that Commission." Well, Sir, but there are some people who cannot wait for this Commission. The Government say they have no intuition upon this question. Well, there is a large class of people who do not want intuition. They understand it thoroughly by bitter experience. They know they are not likely to require information from a Commission on the subject. We have had, in the course of the debate, a great deal of a priori reasoning as to the value of rents. We have been told, of course, that the Land Commission took into account the future depreciation which was to take place. Well, Sir, I must say that seems to me to be a most improbable and unreasonable theory. Even if we have not in the hon. Member for North Meath Mr. Mahony, a very competent witness as to the fact that they did not and could not have done so, how could any surveyor, or land agent, in settling the rent for a lease, say of 15 years, in England, speculate upon a future depreciation, of which he could know nothing, or on a future rise in prices? What he does is what any sensible man would do. He looks back over 15 years, and in fixing the rent he is guided by the fluctuations of the past, and not by the fluctuations of the future, of which he knows nothing. Then we have all sorts of explanations to get rid of the fact of this alteration in value. The noble Lord thinks that it is the bad butter of Ireland. We had another very original theory from the hon. and gallant Member for North Down (Colonel Waring), who thought that the distress of the Irish peasantry was due to the fine gowns worn by the daughters of farmers in Ireland. But we have had some important testimony on the subject from a Gentleman who sits on this side of the House, and is, I believe, a follower of the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale—namely, the hon. Member for South Tyrone Mr. T. W. Russell, who spoke, I think, yesterday, and who commenced his speech by saying, what is perfectly true, and what I have no doubt his constituents would expect him to say, that the fall in prices has been such that the present rents cannot be maintained. This is important and impartial testimony. A Gentleman mentioned to me to-night an important resolution which has been carried in County Down, in flourishing Ulster, to the effect that in the present state of prices rents cannot be maintained. I alluded the other day to the opinion of Sir James Caird, and I have been greatly taken to task in doing so; but I was not the first person who cited Sir James Caird in this House. The Gentleman who vouched him as a witness was my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. I am bound to say he did not concur altogether in the opinion of Sir James Caird; but he pointed out what I have pointed out also—what an enormous and necessary effect the expression of that opinion must have had upon the minds of the tenantry of Ireland. But I take neither the opinion of landlords on this matter, nor the opinion of the representatives of the tenants, as I think both of them are likely to be pretty strongly biased. I am perfectly willing, if you please, to accept the view that Sir James Caird is a reckless sort of writer, who says things he does not mean, on very important subjects—who says one thing one day and recalls it another. Well, I will accept that view of Sir James Caird's character, if you please. But I saw the other day a very important piece of evidence upon this subject, given by a witness who, I think, will be considered to be a valid and important witness. He was a witness before the Royal Commission on the Depression of Trade—Mr. Murrough O'Brien—who is superintendent of land sales under the Land Commission, and is probably a man who knows as much on this subject as anybody you will be able to put upon your Commission. This is what he told you last March of the fall in the price of cattle, which is one of the main elements of depression in Ireland. First of all, he says, that store cattle have fallen 50 per cent below the prices of 1877 and 1878. Now, that is a very important statement—a more important statement, I think, than anything which was said by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the bad manufacture of butter—and I would refer hon. Members, without waiting for the close of spring, if they require information upon this subject, to that gentleman's evidence. I will not detain the House by reading more than one single answer. He says—

"I do not think, as long as prices are so very low, that the existing rents, taxes, and the subsistence of the population can be provided for as they ought to be—that is, I do not think the existing rents can be maintained under the depression if it continues. If they are maintained, it means that some of the population must go, or live in a very much poorer way than they do at present."

Now, Sir, I venture to say that that is as good authority as that of any Commission you may be able to appoint; but, as this matter is of such infinite and urgent importance, I will venture to refer to another authority. This is not a National League authority, nor an authority biased in any way by the conflicting interests in Ireland. It is an authority that all the House will respect. It is the Report—and a Report which is on the Table of the House—of Mr. Tuke upon the question of the condition of Ireland. Now, I will not refer specially to the part which relates to the Island of Achill, because I know the circumstances of that particular case are singular, and should not be taken as a specimen of the condition of the country generally, except this, which I will quote even of Achill. Mr. Tuke says that he asked a merchant at Westport whether the rents were paid, and he answered—"Yes, up to March, 1885; but now it is impossible." And he gave as a reason for it, among others, that they could then get a price for cattle; but that now, if they drove the cattle to the fairs, they could not get a price, and the shopmen would not give them a bag of meal (14s.) for a beast. They had sold cows for 15s., and now had no milk for their own family. "And this," says Mr. Tuke, "is due to the impossibility of getting a sale for the cattle. I have heard it everywhere." But I pass from the Island of Achill to the mainland of Ireland—to the coast of Connaught. [A laugh.] The coast of Connaught, with all respect to the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) is the mainland of Ireland. It is not an island, although Ireland is. So entirely is the noble Lord denationalizing Ireland that he will not allow me to speak of the coast of Connaught as being on the mainland of Ireland. Subject to that interpretation, Mr. Tuke says—these are the notes that he took—

"In this visit I had the great advantage of being accompanied by Mr. A. E. Horne, the Resident Magistrate, whose acquaintance with the district and sympathy with the people gave much added weight to any information I might obtain."

Then he says—

"John Malley's rent is £2 4s. He paid his rent last November two years, but could pay none since. This is the case with every man in Clew Bay."

Mr. Tuke goes on to say—

"One man who had one cow took it to five fairs, and he was not even asked the price of it."

[A laugh.] Oh, you may laugh at these things! I was sorry to hear the laugh of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). I am sure that he does not mean a want of sympathy.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I did not laugh; I only smiled.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will read the hon. and gallant Gentleman something he will not even smile at. Mr. Tuke says—

"In the village (Doobeg) there are 13 houses, in which 87 people live. Hugh Cattigan's daughter lately died for want of proper nourishment, and he had not the few shillings necessary to buy a coffin for her, until his neighbours, who are almost as poor as himself, subscribed the pence which they received for the eggs sold, and the Mulvanny police subscribed their shillings to buy the boards required to make the coffin."

I will go on now with the question of rent and the fall in agricultural prices. Mr. Tuke continues—

"Martin Patton's circumstances are about the same. He sold a four-year-old cow after calving for £3, and was at three fairs before he succeeded in selling her. He sold her in Newport Fair, and bought Indian meal with the price of her, but that is all used now. He bought this cow last year at Achill Fair, from a man named Cafferkey, of Meelin, for £11."

For which, be it remembered, he could only get £3. Mr. Tuke proceeds—

"The police who accompanied us stated that the people are far worse off now than in 1879-80, and that not one of the Doobeg men has potatoes to sow. They saw them dig them last harvest, and they were not worth digging, being no bigger than marbles."

I do not feel justified in detaining the House by reading more. ["Hear, hear,"] I am sorry that hon. Members opposite should be so impatient at being told these facts, because they are the very facts that they declare they desire to know. After all the speeches we have heard on the other side of the House, ridiculing and throwing doubt upon the existence of this distress, and asserting that the fall of prices has not made a difficulty about paying rent—[Cries of "No!"]—after all that has been said on the other side of the House, I think it is necessary that people should understand the magnitude of the evil, and the greatness and urgency of the danger that is involved. [An hon. MEMBER: The example is not a fair one.] The hon. Member says it is not a fair example. Then he must allow me to record one more sentence. Mr. Tuke says—

"It would be quite beyond the limits of this Report to give details as full as the above of all the districts visited during a journey prolonged over a period of two months, and extending over large portions of Mayo and Galway. Suffice it to say that these faithfully represent the condition of thousands of the small holders of land scattered along the whole coast line of Connaught."

Mr. Tuke, I need not say, is not an agitator, and that he is not saying these things, or painting a gloomy picture, for base political purposes. This is the very evidence hon. Members opposite profess to desire as to the real condition of the tenantry of Ireland; and Mr. Tuke tells us most distinctly that the effect of the fall of prices is to render them unable to pay rent. [Cries of "No!"] The area of special destitution which he points out is West of a line drawn from Derry to Skibbereen, and he says that it represents one-third of Ireland. The population which lies to the West of that line, he says, is in a state of poverty and destitution. But in that state of things what are the Government going to do? That is the practical question which we have a right to ask, and it is the question raised directly by this Amendment. Now, there is one man who, undoubtedly, foresaw the character of the present danger, and the inevitable consequences of it. That man is my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. In April last, he said that there had been a fall in prices of from 20 to 40 per cent. He now says 20 to 30 per cent; but if there has been a fall of prices of from 20 to 30 per cent even, you do not want any Commission to tell you that that practically concludes the question. Where in the world is there any industry which can continue to pay rents with a fall in the profits of 20 to 30 per cent? Take land which yields a profit of £5 per acre. Would such land be able to pay rent? But if it be true, as my right hon. Friend said, that the fall of prices has been from 20 to 40 per cent, it practically concludes the question. My right hon. Friend gave an illustration which goes further than that. He said that this agrarian question is necessarily connected with the question of political discontent. An hon. Member opposite referred to what I had said in regard to the Bread Tax. I spoke of my own experience in the year 1843, when, in the midst of bread riots at that time, men were shot down in the streets of Preston. I was there at the time, and the very illustration which occurred to my right hon. Friend in his argument occurred also to me, but for an exactly opposite purpose. This was before the repeal of the Corn Laws, and there was, undoubtedly, great disorder in those days. There were the Chartists and the Bread Riots. There came, however, a subsequent period, which was the period referred to by my right hon. Friend, and then, although the sufferings of the people of Lancashire were as great, perhaps greater, yet he is quite right in saying that they were borne with exemplary patience. But why? Because they occurred years after 1843, and they were not complicated by political discontent. The people knew that the evils from which they were suffering were not caused by mischievous legislation. Well, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham foresaw all this. He said—"There will be a disturbance. Prices will fall, rents cannot be paid, political discontent will arise, and the Government must do something at once." What did he propose? He proposed to stay evictions for six months. Does he propose that now? Does he urge it upon Her Majesty's Government now? His proposal was a stay of evictions for six months, and not the issue of a Commission. But he is ready now to inquire, by Commission or by a Committee composed of all Parties in this House, into the best method of removing the political discontent of Ireland, by devising the best scheme of Home Rule. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; the right hon. Gentleman said so. In so many words, he declared his readiness, if the two Bills of the late Government were withdrawn, to vote cordially for a Resolution for establishing a Legislative Body in Ireland for dealing with Irish affairs. I am, therefore, entitled to claim my right hon. Friend as a witness to the necessity for dealing with this question. He complains that the proposal of his for the stay of evictions was not encouraged, and that my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) said that it would not have been an easy one to carry, suggesting that the difficulty would have come from the Irish Members below the Gangway. What I said at the time to my right hon. Friend was—"This is an admirable proposal; but have you got the consent of your allies to it? What does the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) say to it? What does Mr. Goschen say—what does the Tory Party say to the proposal to stay evictions?" My right hon. Friend, who, a few months ago, was profoundly impressed with the danger of the situation, is now prepared to support the Government in a course which will certainly afford no remedy at all for six months. What is the plan the Government have for dealing with this state of things in reference to rents?

Sir William Harcourt

My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne says it is rather difficult to ascertain what is their real view. It is, however, of great importance to know what it is, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will have an opportunity of making it perfectly clear. Do they or do they not—we ought to have a definite answer to the question—do they or do they not admit that the judicial rents ought to be dealt with if it should be found that those judicial rents are too high? If they admit that the judicial rents ought to be dealt with, do they contend, as it has been contended, that the difference between the judicial rents and the fair rents, in the present state of prices, is to be paid out of the pockets of the ratepayers for the benefit of the landlords? My right hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Sir William Hart-Dyke), who spoke so well just now, professed entire ignorance and astonishment that anybody should propound so preposterous a doctrine, and he said he could not think where it came from. I cannot tell him where it came from, but I will tell him what it is—

"If it should come out that there is any impossibility in paying rent, I think it is not the landlords who should bear the loss. I think this should be one of the cases for the application of the principle of purchase by the State, and that the State, and not the landlords, should bear the loss."

That was the statement of the Prime Minister. Now, I call upon the Government in this House—this is the House which represents the taxpayers—the House of Lords does not represent the taxpayers, and we have the right to demand of Her Majesty's Government in this matter whether they accept that proposition which I have quoted, or whether they do not? It is perfectly ridiculous to suppose that the Prime Minister of this country should make statements of that character, and that we should not know whether they are seriously meant or whether they are all a farce. Therefore, I ask the Government to give some explanation in reference to that statement. If the statement is accepted by the Government, I hope, at all events, it will not be supported by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. My right hon. Friend said so, and I hope he will abide by it. He said—and there are undoubtedly traces of his early manner in what he said—

"At all events, I do not admit for a moment that there is any sanctity about judicial or any other rents."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Hear, hear!] Why, that is the author of the doctrine of ransom. The words are there, but I want to see the action. The voice is the voice of Jacob; but we want to see what the hands are like. My right hon. Friend went on to say—

"If rent cannot be paid so as to leave a bare subsistence to the tenants, there is no doubt that the landlords must bear the loss."

I want to know whether the Government accept the doctrine of their supporter, the chief advocate of their policy, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? It is imputed to the Government that—

"Under no conceivable circumstances will they touch judicial rents, even if the Commission were to report in favour of the reduction; but my own impression is quite different."

Well, that must have been obtained from some private communication. He continues—

"I have not understood that the Government have pledged themselves in such a way as to the future, and it would be very unreasonable that they should do so. If any Commission reported in the sense I have suggested, no Government would undertake the responsibility of maintaining the judicial rents."

I ask the Government—Do they accept that statement, that no Government will undertake the responsibility of maintaining the judicial rents? That is the view which my right hon. Friend takes of the policy of the Government. And now let me read the statement of the Government upon that subject from the mouth of the noble Lord. The noble Lord said—

"A serious mistake will be made by anybody who thinks that the Government contemplate any further dealing with the Land Question in Ireland in the direction of any revision of the rents by the interposition of the State; that is altogether apart from the policy of the present Government."

My right hon. Friend says—

"I have not understood that the Government have pledged themselves in such a way as to the future, and it would be very unreasonable that they should do so. If any Commission reported in the sense I have suggested, no Government would undertake the responsibility of maintaining the judicial rents."

Looking at the statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, and comparing it with that of the noble Lord, I must congratulate the Government upon having so admirable an exponent of their policy as the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman explains away all its weak points, and assures the House that the Government—neither Lord Salisbury nor the noble Lord opposite—really do intend the things that they have said. The right hon. Gentleman will stand bail for them; he is the real author, the real director, of the policy of the Government. Why, they have only half learnt their lesson. The right hon. Gentleman says that the policy of the Government is not understood by those who have accepted it, and it is necessary that he should get up to explain away the blunders that they have made. Is nothing to be done? My right hon. Friend has spoken of the effects of political discontent. Yes, you may abuse political discontent as much as you like; but, as long as you do not remove it, it will always act upon people in distress; and distress, where political discontent exists, will always be much more productive of social disorder than distress where political discontent does not exist so much. Why has Ireland, for the last 12 months, been comparatively happy and tranquil under the Government of Lord Carnarvon and Lord Aberdeen? Why, because the people of Ireland had hopes. But beware you do not deprive the people in distress of hope; that is the way to compel them and to provoke them to the resistance of despair. These are the warnings which it is our duty to give. We have tried to remove the cause of discontent; you have refused to do so; with you must rest the responsibility; it is our duty, and we have the right, to point this out. No doubt, the Government will denounce me for pointing it out. Oh, yes; I remember the time when the same language was used towards Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. They were denounced as the authors of social disorder. Nothing is more striking in that way than the painful reflection that even such a man as Sir Robert Peel could rise in the House of Commons and accuse Mr. Cobden of inciting to assassination—unworthy language from whomsoever it proceeds. On the subject of Land Purchase, the right hon. Member for West Birmingham said a good deal that was very characteristic of him; it was a favourite subject of attack on the policy of the last Government in the mouth of my right hon. Friend. As I have shown, he condemned the principle of the Land Purchase scheme as indicated by Lord Salisbury and by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, nevertheless, he is going to vote against the Amendment and in support of Her Majesty's Government, having complete confidence in them for the future. But he will not allow us to object to a scheme of that character. He insists that we must support the scheme of Her Majesty's Government, although he differs from it; but he says—"This is exactly like your scheme." If it is exactly like our scheme, it is a little hard upon us that he will not allow us to be converted by his eloquence and arguments. He says—"You are bound in honour to stick to the Land Bill of the late Government; that scheme—which I have demonstrated to the people of the United Kingdom—is injurious to the interests of everybody. I will not allow you to abandon it; honour demands that you should adhere to it." And if we do not he threatens us with the most terrible of all fates—we shall be Dissenting Liberals. "You will become," he says, "even like myself." That is a terrible threat. Hon. Gentlemen behind should beware of it; he will allow us no repentance; we must stick to the Land Bill of the late Government in order that we may perish in our sins. He says the country at the last Election gave an irrevocable and irreversible verdict; but, in spite of that irrevocable and irreversible verdict, my right hon. Friend says—"You cannot and shall not abandon the Land Bill." Well, I am not myself a great believer in irrevocable and irreversible verdicts. My earliest political recollections are of a great Conservative Parliament, elected with a real Conservative majority, in the year 1841, to maintain the sacred doctrine of Protection. That was the irrevocable and irreversible verdict given by the constituencies. It was the issue put to the country; and yet that very Parliament, with that very Ministry, repealed the Corn Laws. So much for irrevocable and irreversible verdicts. If there was anything of an irrevocable and irreversible verdict pronounced at the last Election, I should say it was pronounced on the subject of the Land Act. I hope my right hon. Friend will allow us to seek salvation with him. Still, our scheme was a totally different one from that propounded in outline by the Government. I will not go into details, as that has been amply done already; but besides the additional security that we offered—disparage it if you will, it was something more than the Government offered—there were collateral securities they do not propose; there was the important distinction that it left the Irish Government to collect the rents, and it did not call upon the English Government to collect the rents. In my opinion that was a very important distinction. It did another thing still more important. It was part of the scheme for giving political contentment to Ireland, whereas yours is part of a scheme for refusing it. But the plan of the Government raises enormous sums which are to fall simply and directly upon English credit. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham says he has always been in favour of a great Land Purchase scheme. I thought he had always said he had been in favour of Home Rule. I cannot say that his efforts in promotion of these two causes have been singularly successful. What has been his action? It appears now that any scheme of Home Rule probably not favoured by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, or any Land Scheme which commended itself to the late Prime Minister, are to be regarded, if it comes from those opposite, with some favour. But so determined was he to make war on the late Prime Minister and his Land Bill, that he struck out right and left, and the arguments he used and the appeals he made to the interests, prejudices, and passions of every section of the community were arguments and appeals which were fatal, and will be fatal hereafter to every scheme of Land Purchase. ["Question!"] Now, in speaking on the second reading of the Land Purchase Bill, what did he say? He said—"Remember the precedent you are making." These are the arguments which destroyed the Land Purchase Bill of the late Government, and will destroy the scheme of the present Government. He said—

"If I had no other reason for objecting to the proposal, one sufficient reason would be that before long you may want all this money for yourselves. You are refusing aid to the people of Scotland, you are refusing State aid to the crofters, one of the most deserving classes in the Kingdom. You cannot refuse it to the crofters and the agricultural labourers of England, and grant it to the people of Ireland. These are considerations which the House will do well to weigh before the second reading of the Bill."

Yes, Sir, I admit the force of those arguments, and I tell my right hon. Friend, in making those arguments popular, he has destroyed in advance the Land Bill, not only of the last Government, but the Bill of the Government that has come after them. Well, then, he said we are bound to treat the question of Home Rule and the question of Land Purchase as inseparable. He has tried to pin us to that, but he will not succeed in doing so. He cannot have his irrevocable and irreversible verdict, and yet treat it as if it had never taken place; and I say, in answer to my right hon. Friend, and I am speaking the opinions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, that the two questions are not inseparable. [An hon. MEMBER: How will the landlords like that?] There is nothing new about it. Did not my right hon. Friend warn you some months ago that "the sands were running out?" I do not say that the Land Purchase Bill is a bad thing in itself. I think that a great number of arguments can be advanced in its favour; but, Sir, the Conservative Party, by the language they held at the last Election, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, have done all they can to make it impossible to pass it. The noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale boasted that he had been so discreet as to say nothing about it. Well, considering the noble Marquess's position in reference to Ireland, there is nothing surprising in his discretion. Now, Sir, you may depend upon it, that whenever the Tory Party come to propose a Land Bill, it is not only from this side of the House that they will meet with opposition, but I venture to say that they will meet with very strong opposition from the other side of the House. The Tory Party will find their Land Bill destroyed by the same arguments by which they and others have destroyed our Land Bill. On the other side of the House, also, you will find dissentient Conservatives. I heard some remarks the other day from that side of the House of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth). He is a generous kind of man. He stated that the working men of England "were prepared to bear a national fine in favour of the landlords in Ireland." That is a grand doctrine. The hon. Member for Salford has long been a respected teacher of the Conservative Party; but they are not all quite obedient pupils. There arose, on those Benches opposite, the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison), and he said that—"He must claim to represent a working class constituency and the working men of that constituency; and he wished to say that his constituents objected to pay one shilling of English taxation either towards the landlords or the tenants of Ireland."

"No measure would be so unpopular as that which saddled the taxation of this country or the industries of this country with any charge whatever for the relief of landlords in Ireland. If the landlords in Ireland were not able to obtain their rents, they would be but in the same position as the unhappy manufacturers in Lancashire and in the North generally, who when they could not get their money were obliged to go without, or do with less. The best way for either the landlord or tenant to get a living was to practise industry and sobriety. . . . One thing he hoped the Government would not do was to assist the landlords with the money of hard-working Englishmen."

I do not wish in this matter to bind the opinion of any man except myself on this question of the Land Purchase Bill. I have said distinctly that the two questions are separable, and in saying that I believe I express the opinion of my Colleagues. But this opinion I wish to state on my own responsibility—that whatever may be the argument in favour of the Land Purchase Bill, and of changing the system of dual ownership, as it is called, into one of single ownership, I believe that the difficulties which have been created in the way of it, and the arguments used on that side of the House and by Liberal Unionists on that subject, have made it a practical impossibility. I believe it never can receive that support which would be necessary to the dealing with such vast sums of the public money. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has shown that you cannot confine it to Ireland alone; you must extend those immense grants of public money to Scotland, if to Ireland; you must extend them to the agricultural labourers of England; and if you give an extension of this character to transactions of this kind, you will raise the amount to such a gigantic figure as the nation would never sanction. That is my opinion as to the future of Land Purchase. Then what is the situation in which the Government leave the Irish Question? There are difficulties in the minds of hon. Members which can hardly be denied. The Government have no provision to meet them. They rely on the ordinary law, and, if necessary, they will come for the extraordinary law. They have tried that before; we have tried it before—[Laughter]—yes, and it is because we have found that it always failed, that we have determined not to try that method any more, but to seek a new departure and a better way. That policy has failed. I have come to the conclusion that it will always fail. Well, you have come to an opposite conclusion. You have got the power, and you will try the old way. It is our duty to tell you that we believe it will not be successful in the future any more than it has been in the past. You will try your scheme; you have the authority, and with you must rest the responsibility of the future.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): It is with great diffidence that I venture to trespass for a short time on the House after the solemn prophecies of the Leader of the "Chosen People." I am encouraged, however, in that course by the recollection that the prototype of the Party which now arrogates to itself the title of the "Chosen People" had to wander for 40 years in the Wilderness; that two of them only ever reached the Promised Land; and that their Leader was not one of those two. Sir, I think that the history of the modern "Chosen People" may possibly be not unlike that of their prototype, if, according to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night, they are to be a Party without any fixed principles of political action. The right hon. Gentleman told us that he was saying nothing new when, alluding to the irreversible verdict of the country at the late Election, he expounded the present policy of what I was going to call the Separatist, but, as that may be insulting, I will call the non-Unionist Party. Sir, there is nothing irreversible about the right hon. Gentleman. There was not a trace of his early manner this evening—of that manner in which he dealt with "the foul conspiracy of the Land League," and alluded to hon. Members who now sit in this House as "preaching the doctrines of treason and assassination." No, Sir, all that is changed; and it is funny to hear the right hon. Gentleman of all men in this House twitting the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) with inconsistency, and comparing himself to Cobden and Bright, the most consistent politicians known in our political history. Well, the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham have sat opposite to me for some years past. I have learnt to admire their qualities and their powers. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is more than a match for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby; but when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby reminds the right hon. Member for West Birmingham of his action with regard to an Amendment to the Address in answer to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne in February last, I am very glad to congratulate the right hon. Member for West Birmingham on his having learnt wisdom from the remarkable consequences that followed from that Amendment, and on having found that the principles he has advocated are more likely to be promoted by not repeating that example. But there is one feature about the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night which is to me very extraordinary, and it is this. We have had two important speeches in the course of this debate from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), the Leader of the non-Unionist Liberals. On the second occasion, the right hon. Gentleman claimed and obtained the indulgence of the House, in order that he might go at full length into the whole policy of Her Majesty's Government; yet not one word did he say as to the announcement which the right hon. Gentleman has made to-night. To-night, for the first time, we learn that the "inseparable" Land Bill, commended by every consideration of honour and every obligation of duty, is now a separable measure from any proposals for Home Rule. Is it that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian shrank from making this announcement himself, and left it to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, as the most reversible of his Colleagues in the late Government? Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) has dwelt a good deal upon a very valuable Report which has been recently presented by Mr. Tuke. He quoted statements in that Report with regard to some very distressing cases, as if they were really specimens of the state of affairs existing throughout the whole of Ireland, and he asked us what we were going to do on that Report. Well, I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has not read the whole of the Report, and I think it was unfair of him not to state to the House that the recommendation with which Mr. Tuke concluded his Report is precisely the same as that which has been undertaken by Her Majesty's Government—namely, that we are going to refuse Home Rule for Ireland, and that we are going to attempt reproductive works, especially in connection with the fisheries and better communications. But the right hon. Gentleman is inquisitive as to our policy. He asks us hypothetical questions as to what we are going to do if the Commission on this Land Question should report in a certain way. Well, Sir, we decline to answer those inquiries just as often as the right hon. Gentleman may choose to make them. We should not have appointed this Commission, if we had been prepared without the inquiry of the Commission to announce our policy. We should be playing with the question; we should be stultifying ourselves, if we were able to state how we should meet the Report of that Commission, without knowing what the Report would be. I have only to say that my noble Friend Lord Randolph Churchill and myself differ in no respect on this question from one another. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to find any real difference between our speeches in the House on this matter. My noble Friend and I have stated the policy of Her Majesty's Government on this subject, and at this hour of the morning (12.35) it would be absolutely disrespectful to the House if I attempted to reiterate what has already been said. Of course, I have something to say, and I shall say it as shortly as I can, with respect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). I find that one argument runs through all the speeches by which it has been supported, including the speeches delivered on the Front Opposition Bench, and it is this. The inability to pay rent is predicted generally during the coming winter, as if it were solely on account of the fall in the prices of produce. They presume that evictions are likely to occur from this and from no other causes. I confess I question very much the extent of that inability as stated by hon. Members opposite. I do not deny that it does exist, because otherwise Her Majesty's Government would not have appointed a Commission to inquire into it. The hon. Member for the City of Cork seems to take it for granted that the judicial rents were fixed by the Sub-Commissioners at certain rates, without sufficient regard to the late fall in prices, and that those rates were such as to make it impossible to pay those rents at the present price of produce. He adduces no proof whatever in support of this assertion; but an hon. Member who followed him spoke with the authority of his own experience in the matter. The hon. Member told the House that the Sub-Commission, of which he was a Member, had considered the question of the variation of prices, but had not sufficiently considered it; in fact, he admitted that he was wrong when acting as a Sub-Commissioner in supposing that a cycle of good years was going to begin at a very early date. If the hon. Member was wrong once in such a matter, may he not be wrong again? This is what I want to put before the House—that it is by no means proved that the fall in prices is of a permanent character, and even if it were, the prices are not now low enough to make it impossible that the judicial rents generally should be paid. I will quote a statement from a Report which I have lately received from the Land Commissioners on this subject. The hon. Member for South Sligo (Mr.

Sexton) challenged us to show that the Sub-Commissioners, in fixing the rents, left a margin for the fall in prices. Hon. Members will admit that prices from 1881 to 1885 were higher than they are now; and I think it is clear that the Sub-Commissioners generally—whatever may have been the experience of one particular Sub-Commissioner—cannot have fixed the judicial rents on the prices which prevailed then. Up to June 30 of this year, the total amount of judicial rents fixed in Ireland amounted to £2,618,970; while, turning to Griffith's valuation on the same holdings, we find that the amount is £2,447,877, showing a difference of not much more than £170,000 between the judicial rents and Griffith's valuation. Does that not show that the judicial rents, if they were fixed on the prices at all, were fixed on a scale very little above Griffith's valuation? I never heard in Ireland that Griffith's valuation was a high one, except, perhaps, in Ulster. In the South and West of Ireland, to which the hon. Member for the City of Cork's Amendment is particularly addressed, Griffith's valuation is considered very low. [Cries of "No!"] Griffith's valuation was fixed on the prices of these articles—wheat, oats, barley, butter, beef, mutton, and pork. The prices of five of these articles were considerably lower at the time of Griffith's valuation than the present prices are. I do not want to weary the House; but, if I am permitted, I will give a few figures which bear on the subject. I find that the price of wheat, quoted in the Act of 1852, on which Griffith's valuation was based, was 7s. 6d. a cwt. of 112 lbs.; it is now 6s. 5d. The price of oats was 4s. 10d. for this weight in 1852; it is now 6s. The price of barley was 5s. 6d. for the same weight; it is now 6s. 3d. The price of butter was 65s. 4d. in 1852; it is now 64s. 8d. The price of beef was 35s. 6d. in 1852; it is now 52s. 6d. The price of mutton was 41s. in 1852; it is now 56s. The price of pork in 1852 was 32s.; it is now 48s. An hon. Member, speaking from that quarter of the House, told us the other day that potatoes—though they are not included in the produce calculated in Griffith's valuation, they are certainly very important articles of produce—have considerably risen in price between 1878 and 1884. I have obtained these figures from the highest authority—the Valuation Office of Ireland. If these things are so, it is also the fact, as I think everybody knows it is the fact, that the prices of articles of consumption which, at any rate, the better class of farmers in Ireland use, have considerably fallen. The price of labour has risen, yet the small farmers employ very little labour; and, finally, the means of sending produce to market have very much improved in Ireland. I think if all these matters are taken into consideration, the House will hardly believe that there is sufficient ground for the statement of the hon. Member for South Sligo that a crash will come during the next winter, unless something be done to avert it, or that, as a general rule, it is impossible that rents fixed on a valuation evidently very little above Griffith's valuation can be paid by the tenants in Ireland, notwithstanding the prospect of a good harvest which is before them.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House the information he has received from the Land Commission on the subject of the judicial rents outside Ulster—in the Provinces of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught—above the Poor Law valuation?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have not the figures by me; but I quite understand what the hon. Member is alluding to. He is objecting, and I think very fairly, that you must not generalize too much in this matter.

MR. PARNELL: Outside Ulster they are 25 per cent above the Poor Law valuation.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I contradict that flatly.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: What I was seeking to establish by the figures I have quoted is this—that, generally speaking, there cannot be that impossibility to pay the judicial rents in Ireland which has been loudly stated by hon. Members below the Gangway, and which has been supported by the authors of the Land Act sitting on that Bench. I do not at all deny that the judicial rents may possibly be high in particular cases and in particular districts, which are mainly affected by the prices of those articles of produce, such as butter, which have fallen as compared with Griffith's valuation. That is the reason we propose that the Commission shall ascertain, not—as the hon. Member for South Sligo put it—whether prices had exceptionally fallen, but how the operation of the Land Act is affected by that fall in prices; and, without inquiry, I venture to say it is utterly impossible for the House to consider that the question can be fairly dealt with. Of course, we are told by hon. Members below the Gangway that evictions in large numbers will take place during the ensuing winter, on account of inability to pay these judicial rents to which I have alluded. Well, now, Sir, it has already been stated by me, speaking previously on this question, that to say nothing of the remissions which landlords have made in rents, not being judicial rents, and which I do not in the least doubt they would be prepared to make again, the tenant not under a judicial rent can appeal to the Court against a writ of eviction, in order that the execution of that writ may be stayed, until he is able to obtain a fair rent for his holding. The answer that has been given to that statement by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) is that such appeals have been very rare, in consequence of the difficulties that lay in the way of prosecuting them. But the tenants in Ireland find no difficulty in going to the Courts, as has been shown by the working of the Land Act, when left to themselves; and, considering that out of the total number of tenants in Ireland no less than 460,000 would be able to take this course, I cannot see how that danger of unfair eviction could exist in their case which has been so broadly stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork. But, then, when I come to leaseholders, or tenants holding under judicial rents, of whom I believe there are about 140,000 in Ireland, I am informed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) that even with regard to them the County Courts are empowered by the general order of the Judges to suspend at their discretion the execution of ejectments, and that a similar jurisdiction has been always exercised by the Supreme Court. Of course, I am aware that is only a suspension; but, as far as I gather, that power of suspension is precisely what the hon. Member for the City of Cork, in his own speech, suggested should be given; and, considering that the Courts have this power already, considering that they may, if they choose, exercise it, I am bound to say I cannot see how right hon. Gentlemen opposite can suggest an alteration of the law. As I have said, I do not at all wish to detain the House, and I will only say a few words upon the last paragraph of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. Now, the hon. Member has put throughout his whole speech, and throughout his whole Amendment, and so have those who support it, the inability to pay as the sole ground of non-payment of rent in Ireland. Sir, we cannot take that view. We have included in the terms of the Reference to the Commission the duty of inquiring how far the operation of the Land Act is affected, not only by the alteration in prices, but also by the combinations that exist to resist the fulfilment of legal obligations; and I am astonished that in the speeches that have been delivered from that Bench, no allusion, so far as I remember has been, made at all to that which is, to our minds, the most important element in this question. Therefore, Sir, feeling as we do that, if there be non-payment of rent in Ireland during the winter, that non-payment will generally arise, not from inability, but from unwillingness to pay, unwillingness, perhaps, easily fortified by a little terrorism, or due entirely to terrorism—if that be so, obviously we cannot accept the interpretation which the hon. Member for the City of Cork places, I suppose, on the third paragraph of his Amendment. That paragraph seems to us to be based on an entirely unwarrantable assumption. If non-payment of rent is due to combination and unwillingness, what would be more unjust than that the landlords of Ireland should be fined on account of non-payment due to these causes? Sir, we have put forward, as the ultimate object of this Commission and of our land policy, the extension of the present system of converting occupiers in Ireland into owners. I was sorry to hear the mode in which that matter was treated by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) to-night. I confess I had thought, until I heard his speech, that the whole House was practically agreed in sympathy with that object, provided it could be carried out with fairness to owners of land, to the occupiers of land, and to the taxpayers of the country. Well, the hon. Member for South Sligo told us that the Land Purchase Bill of the late Government, which is now dead, which is separated from their Home Rule proposal, in his opinion did not involve the slightest risk to the country, although, at the same time, he was strongly supporting this Amendment, which says that many tenants will be unable, on account of poverty, to pay their rents. What was the hon. Gentleman's reason for such an assertion? He said that he and his Friends had reason to believe that the 20 years named in the Bill as the number of years' purchase would be in some remarkable way whittled down in operation. I should like to know his reason for thinking so; because it seems to me almost an insult to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) to suggest, as I think the hon. Member for South Sligo did, that he had put before Parliament a Bill apparently giving to landlords in Ireland 20 years' purchase for their estates, intending, at the same time, to appoint a Commission to whittle it down practically to nothing. Well, I am bound to admit that, so far as my opinion goes, there must be some risk in any scheme of Land Purchase in Ireland. It may be that there must be some loss to the State in effecting it. We wait to deal with that question until we are furnished with the facts, until we have the suggestions of the Commission, until we are able to make up our own minds on those subjects; and all I will say now is this—that we shall approach the consideration of the question, I believe, in ample time to legislate next Session in regard to it, with the determination of doing justice to all interests affected, including that of the British taxpayer, in whose behalf hon. Members opposite are so remarkably anxious. Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) twitted us the other evening with not being supported in our policy by the great majority of the Irish Members. Well, Sir, we may not be supported by them at present. Perhaps, when our policy on the question of land is developed, when practical proposals are laid before the House, we may be more fortunate in that respect; but I think it is strange that this taunt should come from an hon. and learned Gentleman who was a Member of the late Government, who, a very few months ago, specially reserved this dealing with the Land Question for the Imperial Parliament, and would not allow the Irish Representatives in Dublin to deal with it themselves. Why, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne has stated more plainly than any of his Colleagues the necessity for dealing with the Irish Land Question in the Imperial Parliament. He stated, if I remember right, that that necessity was due to the position of the landlords in Ireland, and to the mode in which Parliament had heretofore dealt with them; and I think he intimated very clearly his belief that, owing to the opinions held by hon. Members below the Gangway on the subject of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, there would be great danger of injustice to the landlords, if the Land Question were left to be settled by an Irish Parliament; and yet an hon. and learned Gentleman, who is himself responsible for that policy, taunts us because, in its initiation, our policy does not command the support of hon. Members below the Gangway. Sir, there is one question which was asked by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and which was not answered in the speech of the hon. Member for South Sligo to-night. [Cries of "Belfast!"] Why was it that, pending the consideration by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian of the question of Home Rule for Ireland, pending the consideration of his measures by Parliament and by the country, we heard nothing whatever, either in this House, or, so far as I know, in the country, of this condition of the Irish farmers, which is now brought before us as so terrible and so urgent that we are to deal with it by what amounts to a complete reversal of the Land Act, without even any previous inquiry? Prices were lower as regards stock during the earlier months of 1886 than they are now, and yet I believe the spring and summer rents in Ireland were fairly paid, and why were they fairly paid? Because the pressure which prevented their payment was withdrawn. The hon. Member for South Sligo said, to-night, that the National League advised the tenants to pay the utmost rent they were able to pay. Another hon. Member said they denied there was any conspiracy against the judicial rents, and that not a single Member sitting in that quarter of the House would encourage the tenants in such a policy. Well, Sir, I wish those doctrines were promulgated a little more throughout Ireland. The House will remember the witty suggestion made a long time ago, when the Government of this country appointed Bishops to the Established Church of Ireland, that very admirable and religious men were selected by the Ministers of the day, but that when these men set out on their journey to Ireland they were waylaid on Hounslow Heath by highwaymen, who robbed them of their credentials and obtained installation in their place. I am almost afraid that the difficulty of communication with Ireland which then was felt must exist in some mysterious fashion still, so that the counsels of patience and moderation, and fulfilment where possible of legal obligations, which I have no doubt are given by hon. Members with perfect sincerity, change their nature before they reach the wilds of Connaught. I may be wrong, but reports have reached me, from which it would seem that there must be individuals, almost at the present time, making speeches in the South and West of Ireland, masquerading under the names of hon. Members of this House, who, when they sit here, are perfectly Constitutional and loyal. I agree with the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork that there is a gloomy prospect before us; but I differ from him absolutely as to the reason. He and the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Sligo dwelt on the great advantage to their Party which has been gained by the association with them, and the enrolment under their banner, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and his followers in Great Britain. They went on to anticipate that, before long, that support would be increased, and would bring them success in that which is the great object of their desires. I think, for my own part, that the anticipations of the hon. Members and their Friends in this respect are not likely to be realized. I believe, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Dartford, that the more the people of Great Britain understand what is meant by a separate Government and Parliament for Ireland, the less they will like it. But the hon. Members may be right. It is possible that by Constitutional means the Irish Home Rule Party may convince the reason of the people of Great Britain; but, Sir, one thing I will venture to say, and that is, that the people of Great Britain never will be coerced by a "no rent campaign," backed by intimidation, into conceding to Ireland anything but that which their reason and judgment tell them is right.

QUEEN'S SPEECH — HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Mount-Edcumbe) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:—

My Lords,

"Your loyal and dutiful Address affords Me much satisfaction.

"I rely with confidence on your cordial co-operation in such measures as may be submitted to you for the conduct of the public service during the remaining portion of the financial year."

INDIA (BOMBAY)—THE SIRDAR PRITHI RAO.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he would inquire into the circumstances of the reversing by the late Secretary of State for India of the decision of the Bombay Government in favour of Sirdar Prithi Rao, with the view either of reinstating Sirdar Prithi Rao in his zemindary, or of allowing him to bring his case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or of granting him compensation for his removal from the succession to his late brother's property by the late Secretary of State? The last owner of the estate of the Himmet Bahadur family, Ranoji Rao, died August 13, 1877. His widow applied to the Bombay Government for leave to adopt an heir to her late husband, and the Political Agent supported her application, but proposed that her choice should be limited to a son of Prithi Rao, her late husband's brother. The Bombay Government, in a Resolution of December 7, 1877, approved of this proposal, and added that should Prithi Rao decline to give a son for the purpose further reference should be made to the Government. In May, 1878, Prithi Rao submitted a Memorial to the Bombay Government with proofs of his being entitled to succeed to the ancestral zemindary to the exclusion of an adopted son. On full consideration, the Bombay Government affirmed Prithi Rao's right to succeed to the estate by a Resolution dated August 15, 1878. Radhabhai, the widow, countenanced by the Karbhari, or Minister of Kolhapur, a Brahmin, appealed to the Secretary of State against this decision, and the Secretary of State reversed the decision of the Bombay Government, and allowed the widow of the late zemindar to adopt a son unconditionally, by a decision dated May 27, 1880, and confirmed by a despatch of December 23, 1880, of the Secretary of State. He now complained of the conduct of the India Office on three grounds—first, their decision was contrary to Hindoo law; secondly, the India Office or the Secretary of State were morally incompetent to decide upon succession to property dependent on Hindoo law, which should have been decided judicially; thirdly, in dispossessing Prithi Rao no reasons were given to him for the taking away of his rank and property. He would not trouble the House with details of the Hindoo law with regard to adoption, beyond observing that the Bengal school of interpretation was more lax and more favourable to a widow than that of Maharastra. That a brother should succeed a brother who left no children in the case of a State or of an impartible estate carrying the rank of a Sirdar with it was shown in the case of the Gaekwar of Baroda and the succession of the three brothers Gunput Rao, Khunde Rao, and Mulhar Rao to the Gadi of Baroda. Besides, if the India Office had any sound legal ground for their decision which disinherited Sirdar Prithi Rao, why did they refuse to lay it on the Table of the House or even to let it be seen? Prithi Rao has cited the opinions and decisions in his favour of Sir George Clerk, formerly Governor of Bombay, and Sir George Clerk had confirmed to him that his opinion was such as quoted by Prithi Rao. In the next place, how could the India Office take upon itself to decide a question of Hindoo law in opposition to the Bombay Government, which had the advantage of competent interpreters of that law close at hand? Why had it assumed to decide arbitrarily a question of property, which could only be decided in a satisfactory manner by a judicial hearing? Why did the Secretary of State not request the Chief Justice of Bombay to hear this case, and name two assessors to hear it with him, or else leave it to the Chief Justice to name his assessors? Or why did he not take advantage of the Statute of William IV., and remit the case to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? The Secretary of State had been reminded of this in time if it was true, as was stated in the papers he had received, that the Government of Sir James Ferguson had urged on the Secretary of State that this question was one of exact right, and that the appellant had a legal title to succeed, and that they proposed that the question might be left to the arbitrament of a Judge of the High Court. His third ground of complaint was that, although this question depended entirely on legal issues, Sirdar Prithi Rao had been dispossessed of his rank and property without any reason for it being assigned. It was not till he Lord Stanley of Alderley) had begun to move in the matter that a letter was written on the 20th of April last to Prithi Rao by the Political Agent, Mr. Lee Warner, professing to give the grounds for the Secretary of State's decision of May 27, 1880. This letter, as an exposition of legal matters, is eminently unsatisfactory, and entirely of a sic rolo sic jubeo tenour. The Secretary of State said in this letter—

"If, as shown by Radhabhai's petition of July 1, 1878, and the Karbhari's report of November 13, 1877, it is possible to get for adoption any other fit boy of the family, I see no just reason for prescribing the selection of any certain boy in any certain manner."

No one at all; except that Hindoo law proscribed a certain boy and required the consent of the kinsmen. The noble Lord, in conclusion, asked the Question of which Notice had been given.

THE PRIME MINISTER (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My noble Friend the Secretary of State for India is not a Member of the House, and is, therefore, unable to answer the Question of my noble Friend at the Table. By his wish, I answer it with such lights as I can. There are in the Bombay Presidency a certain number of petty Chieftaincies, of which the rights are decided, not by Courts of Law, but by political authorities; and any appeal from the political authorities is necessarily to the Secretary of State, who decides in Council in the last resort. This is a case of succession depending upon the intricacies of the Hindoo Law of Adoption. With respect to the case itself, I am sorry that I cannot hold out to my noble Friend any hope that it will be re-opened. Whether the present mode of disposing of such cases is the best possible or not, it would be very undesirable that we should depart from the usual law and practice in such matters in any one individual case alone. The worst possible tribunal for re-opening these cases would be this House or the other House of Parliament. My noble Friend wanders with ease through all the mazes of Hindoo law; but we are not most of us similarly qualified to discuss the case, and we should, I am afraid, come to nothing but a very foolish decision. Whether the mode of dealing with these cases is the best possible is a matter which I quite admit is open to discussion. I do not think it would be desirable to send them to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Whether it would be possible to have any machinery in India somewhat after the fashion of that tribunal, without referring these cases to the Secretary of State for India, is, I think, a matter which may be fairly discussed; but it should be discussed on general grounds, and not with reference to any one individual case. I do not wish to express any opinion upon this subject. I am not competent to do so. It is a matter which my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, when he comes into the House, can discuss with my noble Friend who put the Question. But I fear that, whatever we do with respect to the general law, we cannot possibly depart from it in this individual case.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 30th August, 1886.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Selection, Lord Edward Cavendish disch.; Sir H. H. Vivian and Sir Robert N. Fowler added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Secret Service (Repeal) * [41]; Trust Funds (Railways) * [42].

Second Reading—Electric Lighting * [276].

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

PARLIAMENT—COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection do consist of Nine Members.

Ordered, That Lord EDWARD CAVENDISH be discharged.

Ordered, That Sir H. H. VIVIAN and Sir ROBERT N. FOWLER be added to the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray.)

QUESTIONS.

BOARD OF TRADE—HARBOUR LOANS.

Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If he is in a position to state in what form additional facilities are to be offered for the increase or improvement of harbour accommodation by localities willing and able to give the requisite security for interest and repayment of loans of public money?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORME) (Liverpool, East Toxteth), in reply, said, he was not yet in a position to state what additional facilities could be offered; but if the hon. Gentleman would communicate with him privately he would be happy to see what could be done.

Mr. MARJORIBANKS (Berwick) gave Notice that he would next Session draw attention to the want of deep-water harbours on the coasts of England and Scotland, and move that a sum not less than that spent on harbours in Ireland should be expended in providing additional harbour accommodation for those countries.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—THE FISHERY DISPUTES.

Mr. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will be good enough to inform the House the nature of the negotiations in which Her Majesty's Government are engaged with a view to a settlement of the United States and Canadian fishery disputes; and, whether he can, before the rising of Parliament, place upon the Table of the House the Correspondence of the several Governments interested?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): In addition to the negotiations which are going on in America, the Secretary of State is in personal as well as in official communication with the United States Minister. It would be unsatisfactory and undesirable to present to Parliament Correspondence which is in progress.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HEAD CONSTABLE MAGEE.

Mr. ALEXANDER BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If head constable Magee will still be retained at Armagh, notwithstanding that his relations by marriage reside in Thomas Street, Armagh; and, if the usual rule of the constabulary applies in this case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I am informed that the rule referred to in the Question is frequently relaxed when the relationship is so distant as not to interfere with the proper and impartial discharge of duty. This is the case as regards Head Constable Magee; and, therefore, it is not intended to transfer him from Armagh.

RAILWAY RATES—LEGISLATION.

Mr. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether he can give the House any information as to the intentions of the Government with respect to the introduction of a Bill dealing with Railway Rates?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORME) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Yes, Sir; the Board of Trade hope to be in a position to deal with the subject next Session.

EDUCATION — SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION IN THE METROPOLITAN DISTRICTS.

Sir JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, inasmuch as Board Schools in some of the metropolitan districts, are in the habit of receiving children from areas beyond those in which the schools are placed, the consequence being that such schools are not available for the children of parents living within such areas, instructions will be given that when school accommodation becomes urgently required for any particular district, the school in such district shall no longer be available for children of parents living at a distance?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The Education Department have no power to give any general directions as to the course to be followed by the London School Board in the matter referred to; but I may state for the information of the hon. Member that any parent who deems himself aggrieved by the exclusion of his child from a Board School can bring the case before the Department under Article 89 of the Code, and the School Board in question would be communicated with.

BURIALS (ENGLAND AND WALES)— THE CHURCHYARD AT BOLTON-ON-DEARNE, YORKSHIRE.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it has been proved to the satisfaction of an inspector specially sent down from the Home Office to examine into the matter, that the churchyard at Bolton on Dearne in Yorkshire is, and has been for a long time, quite full of bodies; and, if so, why it has been decided that the said churchyard shall not be closed till September, 1887; and, where it is intended to bury persons who may die during the next twelve months?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) Birmingham, E.: Yes, Sir; I am informed by the Inspector that he is satisfied, from a recent inspection, that this churchyard is nearly full; but there is still a narrow strip of ground available for burials, and, moreover, it is anticipated that there will be unusual difficulty in finding a suitable site for a new burial ground. Under these circumstances, the Inspector is of opinion that the existing ground should remain open for another year; and with this opinion, I am told, the Medical Officer of Health for the district fully concurs. In the meantime, should the necessity arise, there will be no difficulty in finding burial room in neighbouring churchyards.

SWINE FEVER—INOCULATION.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If he will be good enough to inform the House what progress has been made in the scientific investigations by the Veterinary Staff of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council with regard to inoculation with attenuated virus in cases of swine fever, which were ordered to be commenced in the month of May last; and, if he is able to state when the Report of Professor Brown on Swine Fever, presented to Parliament on 24th June last, will be delivered to Members?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (LORD JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): The scientific investigations by the veterinary staff of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council with regard to inoculation with attenuated virus in cases of swine fever have not yet been commenced in consequence of the difficulty experienced in obtaining suitable premises (which have to be registered under the Act 39 and 40 Vict. c. 77 in which the investigations can be carried on, and in obtaining the necessary licence for the performance of the experiments on living animals. The Report of Professor Brown on swine fever, presented to Parliament on the 24th of June last, is in the hands of the printer, and will shortly be issued. The Department is in communication with the Home Office with the view of obtaining the necessary sanction to complete the investigations.

SONAL PROPERTY.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will be good enough to take steps to secure the early publication of the Return of "Imperial Taxation on Real and Realised Personal Property," ordered by the House to be printed so long since as the 12th day of August 1885, and which Return has not yet been circulated?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I think I can safely promise my hon. Friend that this Return will be ready for publication in the course of next week.

FINANCE, &c.—TAXATION ON PER-SONAL PROPERTY IN FRANCE, &c.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the information as to existing methods of taxation of personal property in France, Germany, and the United States, applied for in April last, has been furnished by Her Majesty's Representatives; and, whether he will be good enough to lay such information, when received, upon the Table of the House in the form of separate Returns, dealing solely with the special subject-matter of this inquiry?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FENOUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Reports from France and the United States have been received, and are being printed. The Report from Germany is expected in a few days, and it is hoped that the Papers which will be laid upon the Table forthwith will be ready for distribution in about a fortnight.

FRANCE—SUMMARY REMOVAL OF
REV. W. J. DROUGHT.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement of the Rev. W. J. Drought is correct that he has been summarily removed from his Chaplaincy in France, in consequence of his having taken part in an Address to members of the late Royal Family; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to address any remonstrance to the French Government on the subject?

Mr. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) said, that before the Question was answered he wished to know whether it was not the case that the address referred to described the Duc d'Aumale as "His Royal Highness" and spoke of "His Royal House;" whether, as a matter of fact, the Duc d'Aumale had not been expelled from France for disloyalty to his country; whether the Address expressed a hope for his restoration; and, whether Her Majesty's Government approved of British subjects taking part by means of such manifestoes against a friendly Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FENOUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Rev. Mr. Drought's complaint was only received by the Secretary of State on Saturday last. It is receiving his attention; but some days at least must elapse before I shall be in a position to give a definite reply to the Question of my hon. Friend. In reply to the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson), I would submit to him that it would be prudent not to enter into the details of the matter in present circumstances.

PUBLIC HEALTH—RIVER POLLUTION
—THE RIVER CHES, HERTS.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the continued pollution of the River Chess by refuse from the Loudwater Paper Mills, resulting in a nuisance highly dangerous to the inhabitants of Rickmansworth and the district; whether he is aware that, after a long inquiry, a Report was made upon it on 14th July 1885 by Mr. J. T. Harrison, C.E., the Special Inspector appointed by the Local Government Board, and proceedings were taken against the owner, Mr. M'Murray, by the Watford Union Rural Sanitary Board; whether penalty and costs were enforced against Mr. M'Murray; and, whether, as many complaints have been made to the Local Sanitary Authority and the Local Government Board of the daily pollution of the river, he will give instructions for the enforcement of further penalties under "The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1875," or for the repression of the nuisance?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am aware that an inquiry was held into this matter by consent of the Local Government Board in September last. The result of that inquiry was that the Sanitary Authority proceeded against Mr. M'Murray, and an order prohibiting him from polluting the river was obtained. The costs, amounting to £86 13s. 2d., were paid by Mr. M'Murray. Since that time more than one complaint has been received by the Local Government Board to the effect that the nuisance still continues, and the attention of the Rural Sanitary Board has been called to these complaints. They state that, owing partly to proceedings in lunacy which are pending in regard to Mr. M'Murray, no further legal steps have been taken; but that, on the whole, the condition of the river has, undoubtedly, been better since the order of September last. I cannot say that I am satisfied with the position in which the matter stands; but I must point out that the Local Government Board have no power to initiate proceedings. They can only give their consent to proceedings being instituted. I have, however, called upon the Rural Sanitary Authority to cause their Inspector of Nuisances or Medical Officer of Health to report without delay upon the condition of the river, and to furnish a copy of the Report to the Local Government Board.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRADE AND AGRICULTURE—FOREIGN BOUNTIES.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the investigations of the Royal Commission on Trade have resulted in the suggestion of any means for the removal of various inequalities which exist, to the detriment of British industries; and, whether steps will be taken to mitigate the injury which Trade and Agriculture, both in this Country and the Colonies, are suffering from in consequence of the system of bounties granted by Foreign Powers, especially in the importation during 1885 of 700,000 tons of bounty-aided sugars, valued at ten millions sterling, and the unfair advantages afforded to foreign owners and shipbuilders by the payment of bounties upon foreign shipping?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) Paddington, S.: I hope the hon. Member will excuse my saying that it is my distinct opinion that, in respect to the first part of this Question, it is quite in his power to give as valuable and weighty a reply to it as it is in mine. He has only to read the three Reports of the Royal Commission, and, if he does so, I think he will find that the Commissioners have not made any suggestions in the direction which apparently he would wish them to take. In the third Report the Commissioners expressly state that they are not in a position to make a final Report on any of the matters in question. With regard to the second Question of the hon. Member, of course the Government are well aware that the manufacturing interests in connection with the sugar question in this country have suffered injury from the operation of foreign bounties; but we are not in a position to state whether it is in our power, in any degree, to mitigate that injury. Of course, the hon. Member will understand that the Government must also take into consideration in connection with this question the interests of the consumer. I have never yet heard it alleged that the interests of the consumer are injuriously affected by the operation of these foreign bounties; but I may add that it is at the present moment under the consideration of the Government whether they could advantageously re-open negotiations with Foreign Governments as to the general operation of the bounty system upon the manufacture of sugar.

INLAND REVENUE—REPAYMENT OF INCOME TAX.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has considered the printed circular lately issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, from which it would appear that persons not liable to Income Tax, but compelled to pay it, are not to be permitted to claim repayment until after the 5th April next; and, whether he can see his way to remedy this grievance?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): I have inquired into this matter, and I find the rule laid down in the Circular referred to is necessary. Of course, it is only after the close of the financial year that the claim of any individual to exemption can be examined, for it is only at the end of the year that it can be beyond doubt. As to the second Question of the hon. Member, any alternative to the present system would entail an immense increase of labour on the staff, as the claims to repayment number 118,000. Although I cannot give the hon. Member any assurance that the general operation of the rule can be modified, at the same time, if any exceptional cases arise, I should advise him to communicate directly with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and I do not doubt that any recommendation he makes will be carefully attended to.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—RE-OPENING OF WESTMINSTER HALL.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the First Commissioner of Works, When it is intended that Westminster Hall should be again opened to the public; and, whether it is first to be redecorated; and, if so, when that work will be commenced and when it is expected to be completed?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): Westminster Hall was closed and has been kept closed by the advice of the Home Office, and my right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary informs me that he cannot at present sanction any departure from the existing regulations

The question of redecorating the Hall has not, so far as I am aware, been under consideration.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)— HEAVY GUNS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any, and, if so, what, steps are now being taken with a view to the design and manufacture of guns of large calibre, which can be considered reliable when employed in active service and fired without fear of failure with service charges, so as to enable the Admiralty to construct ships, and the Royal Engineers to build forts, intended for use with such guns?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Question of the hon. Gentleman appears to me to suggest that he is unaware that there is an experimental establishment at Shoeburyness, and that officers of the Army and Navy, assisted by eminent civilians, are specially charged with the duties to which he points; but I suggest to my hon. Friend that the importance of the subject renders it desirable that it should be dealt with with the gravity it deserves in a serious discussion on the Estimates, which I hope we may reach in a few days, rather than by an answer to a Question, which cannot be full or complete.

ADMIRALTY—MEDALS OF THE SAILORS AND NAVAL OFFICERS IN THE EGYPTIAN AND SOUDAN CAMPAIGNS.

MR. EDWIN DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When the medals and clasps due to the sailors and Naval officers who served in the late Egyptian and Soudan Campaigns, or in the case of those who did not survive to their relatives, are likely to be distributed, seeing that the same medals due to soldiers and officers of the Army have been distributed more than a year ago?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The medals were advertised in The London Gazette of May 28 last as ready for distribution, and the greater portion of them have since been issued. Applications have been called for, and are attended to immediately on receipt. It may be observed that there is greater difficulty in obtaining the necessary information for the preparation of the Naval medal rolls as compared with those for the Army.

TRADE MARKS—FALSE MARKING AND WRAPPING—LEGISLATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If that Department has come to a decision as to the necessity of fresh legislation in greater restraint of the false marking and deceptive wrapping of goods sold in the United Kingdom, for the more effectual protection of British industry against foreign competition; and, in such case, if a Bill will be introduced early in the ensuing Session providing for the necessary changes in the Law?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Board of Trade hope to have an opportunity of introducing next Session a measure to deal with the matters referred to.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—LOUGH ERNE.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the drainage of Lough Erne with its tributaries and the Ulster and Ballinamore Canals, so intimately connected therewith, will be referred to the proposed Commission on the development of Irish resources?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I have no information myself on this subject; and I regret, therefore, that I cannot give any to the hon. Member.

SOUTH AFRICA—PONDOLAND—THE PONDOS.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea Town) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Pondos have recently submitted to Her Majesty's High Commissioner at the Cape proposals for the settlement of all their differences with the Government of the Cape Colony; whether they have offered, if necessary, to refer certain questions to arbitration; and, what steps Sir Hercules Robinson has taken to arrive at an understanding with the authorities of Pondoland?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle):

The proposals for the settlement of the differences with the Pondos were, in fact, claims for the St. John's River country and for the control of the Xesibes or their country. These could not be entertained, as both of these countries have already been a part of the Cape Colony, and, indeed, the abandonment of the Xesibes after the promises made to them would have been impossible. Her Majesty's Government do not know of any offer to go to "arbitration"—a term hardly applicable to South African Native territories under the supervision of the High Commissioner. But they are always ready to consider the representations of the Pondos, through the High Commissioner. As their claim cannot be entertained Sir Hercules Robinson has, with the concurrence of the Cape Government, offered to consider with the Pondos whether they should have money compensation for any losses they may have sustained by the Proclamation of 1878. They have hitherto refused to negotiate on this basis; but it is hoped that they and their European advisers may eventually entertain this offer.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (ENGLAND AND WALES).—REMOVAL OF CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether it is true, as reported, that the Treasurer of Christ's Hospital, in giving evidence last month before Mr. Clutton in the General Post Office Compensation Case—

"Spoke to the necessity of having residence for the masters in the immediate neighbourhood of St. Martin's le Grand". The Governors had discussed the question of removing the school, and decided not to remove it:—

and, if this report is correct, what effect will be given to the unanimous Report of the Royal Commissioners in 1877, that—

"For a thorough reform in the management and discipline of the school, we think that its removal from London is indispensable."

and to the scheme of the Charity Commissioners, lately issued, which endorses such view, and, after examination of the funds, proposes that nearly if not quite double the number of children should be forthwith benefited?

THE VICE PRESIDENT Sir HENRY HOLLAND (Hampstead): I have no information as to the statement attributed to the Treasurer of Christ's Hospital; but the scheme of the Charity Commissioners, providing for the removal into the country of the existing school, as well as the establishment of other schools in London, has not been abandoned, and is now under the consideration of the Education Department.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND).—CULDAFF SALMON FISHERY PIER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence given during the recent fishery inquiries in Innishowen by Mr. R. M. Fleming, the lessee of the Culdaff Salmon Fishery, with reference to the pier lately constructed at Culdaff, viz.—

"That it is of no benefit to anyone; that it is not suitable for even the smallest description of boat, as it is so arranged that if you wish to land you have first to get out of the boat and wade ashore; that no provision in the way of a boat-slip has been made, and the boats cannot be left in the dock over six hours without being broken to pieces by the rise and fall of the tide. Altogether it has been about as useless an expenditure of public money as could possibly be imagined:—"

whether the Commissioners inspected the pier, and agreed with the complaints put forward against it; whether four thousand pounds have been expended on it; whether this pier was constructed under the Board of Works; and, whether it is to the same authority that the Government propose to entrust the works which the proposed Royal Commission are intended to recommend?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I have made inquiries about this case, and I am informed that the pier named was constructed under the Board of Works, who acted on instructions from the Fishery Pier and Harbour Commissioners. These Commissioners instructed the Board to make a pier at a cost not exceeding £4,000. The plans made by the Board were submitted to, and approved by, the Fishery Pier and Harbour Commissioners; but the limit of £4,000 was probably insufficient to enable the pier to be made as long as was desirable it should be. No complaint, so far as I know, has been made as to the quality of the work, nor of any departure from the plans approved by the Fishery Commissioners. No responsibility, therefore, attaches to the Board of Works in the matter. The latter part of the Question I am unable to answer.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask if the allegations in the Question with regard to the fishery pier are correct; and if the Board of Works are prepared to supplement the existing structure so as to render it useful?

MR. JACKSON said, the hon. Member knew, as well as anybody, that the Board of Works had no control over the Fishery Pier and Harbour Commissioners. They could only spend such a sum of money upon the works as was placed at their disposal. There was no objection to enlarge the pier if the Commissioners approved of it.

MARRIAGES (ATTENDANCE OF REGISTRARS).

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the purpose of dispensing with the presence of the registrar at marriages in Nonconformist Chapels; and, if not, whether he intends to reintroduce his Bill of the last Parliament, or to take any effective steps to secure the settlement of the question in a manner satisfactory to the Nonconformists of the Country?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): Her Majesty's Government hope to be able to introduce, early next Session, a Bill to deal with the question of the attendance of Registrars of Marriages in Nonconformist chapels.

FIRES (METROPOLIS)—FIRE AT MILLWALL.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the destructive fire at a petroleum wharf at Millwall last week; whether he is aware that, but for a fortunate change of wind, the overground tanks near the River would have been destroyed, causing the escape of many thousand gallons of burning oil into the River Thames, and probably leading to an unparalleled conflagration; whether he is aware that at another petroleum wharf, in a densely populated part of the East End of London, there is, at the present moment, about three millions of gallons of petroleum, the bulk of which is lying in barrels in the open air, protected from the sun and from fire by wicker hurdles only; and, what steps he proposes to take for the safe storage of petroleum?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been drawn to this fire; but I am advised that the proprietor of the wharf had caused the tanks to be surrounded by an efficient containing wall and embankment, so that it would have been impossible for any escape of burning oil to have taken place into the Thames, even if all the tanks referred to in the Question had been destroyed and their contents had been liberated. In reply to the second part of the Question, I have to say that I have caused inquiries to be made, and I am informed that the only wharf to which the Question can apparently apply is one in which it is true the greater part of the storage takes place in barrels in the open. Nevertheless, the whole area over which the storage extends is completely surrounded by a brick and concrete wall and earth embankment, which forms an efficient reservoir of a capacity largely in excess of the aggregate quantity of mineral oil stored there. Lastly, I have to say that the law with regard to mineral oils and inflammable liquids is in an unsatisfactory condition; and I propose to take steps, with a view to legislation on the subject next Session, which will enable the Home Office efficiently to enforce the safe storage of petroleum.

AGRICULTURAL LEASES (SCOTLAND)—A COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will consent to the appointment of a Royal Commission, or otherwise, to inquire into the present condition of tenant farmers and crofters in Scotland, who complain of loss by being bound under nineteen years leases, contracted and entered upon prior to the recent exceptional and apparently permanent fall in the price of agricultural products, with a view to legislation on the subject when Parliament again meets?

Mr. Jackson

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) in reply, said, that as regarded the crofters, their case had already been considered, and the House had resolved not to interfere with their leases. As regarded the farmers, the Government did not, as at present advised, think any public advantage would be gained by an inquiry into the causes which had made, or which might make, contracts freely entered into by private parties onerous to one or other of the contracting parties, nor did they think that such an inquiry, if instituted, could be confined to the case of landlords and tenants; at the same time, for his own part, he was of opinion that landlords would do well to revise the terms of their leases, in order to see how far a modification of the original contracts was desirable under existing circumstances. He believed that this was being done all over Scotland.

MR. ENSLEMONT asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was not aware that certain counties in the Highlands were excluded from the benefits of the Crofters Act; and whether the present Government would remedy this defect in the Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he was aware that the tenants on small leases were not crofters under the definition adopted in the Crofters Act; but the question whether they should be included in that definition was very fully discussed when the Bill was before the House.

CROFTERS HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1884—EXTENSION OF ACT.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the Secretary for Scotland, Whether, having regard to the large number of crofters, cottars, and fishermen in the counties of Moray and Nairn, Her Majesty's Government will bring in a Bill to extend the provisions of "The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1884," to the crofters, cottars, and fishermen in these counties?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): After the careful consideration given by the House last Session to the question of the area to be dealt with under the Crofters Holdings Act, Her Majesty's Government do not propose to re-open the subject.

VENEZUELA—TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will instruct the Consul General at Caracas to make representations to the Government of Venezuela, with reference to the prohibition at present in force against the importation into the United States of Venezuela of such important articles of commerce as salt, matches, candles, dynamite, tobacco, wearing apparel, and many other articles, as also to obtain, if possible, the withdrawal of the tariff recently imposed on all goods imported, which has paralyzed the West Indian trade with that country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government are only entitled by Treaty to claim in Venezuela the treatment of the most favoured nation. Unless, therefore, it can be shown that British goods have been less favourably treated than those from other countries, there does not appear to be, in the circumstances stated, any ground for diplomatic representations. With regard to the 30 per cent duty on European goods transhipped at Trinidad to which reference is presumably made in the latter part of the Question, Her Majesty's Government are at present in negotiation with a view to the abolition of this surcharge.

AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES—QUEENSLAND—DIVISION OF THE COLONY.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Colonial Office proposes to introduce a Bill to divide the Colony of Queensland into two portions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No, Sir; it is not true. There has been a movement in favour of the separation of the Northern part of Queensland, and we are informed that there is a counter movement also. The matter will require the fullest consideration when the whole case has been heard.

ADMIRALTY—MR. W. H. WHITE, NAVAL CONSTRUCTOR AND CONTROLLER.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that Mr. W. H. White is holding the appointment of Director of Naval Construction and Assistant Controller of the Navy at the Admiralty, at a salary of £2,000 per annum, while still acting as Consulting Naval Architect to Messieurs Armstrong, Mitchell, and Company (Limited), also at a salary of £2,000; and, whether Mr. W. H. White is under agreement to act as Consulting Naval Architect to Messieurs Armstrong, Mitchell, and Company for a period of ten years?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord George Hamilton) (Middlesex, Ealing): Mr. White's salary as Director of Naval Construction is correctly stated; but all pecuniary relations between Mr. White and Messrs. Armstrong ceased on his appointment to the Admiralty. Mr. White, when I offered him the post of Director of Naval Construction, was under a legal obligation to remain with Messrs. Armstrong up to the end of March, 1888, as their Naval Constructor. As I explained on the 2nd of April of this year in the House, I succeeded in inducing Messrs. Armstrong to give up their claim upon his services, with the single stipulation that for the remainder of the term he was under contract to serve with them they might occasionally consult him provided that any such consultation should not in any way be inconsistent with or interfere with the discharge of his duties at the Admiralty.

LAW AND JUSTICE—"BRYCE v. RUSDEN."

Mr. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any statement has yet been received from Sir Arthur Gordon as to the case of "Bryce v. Rusden;" and, if so, whether such statement will be published?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. Stanhope) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Sir Arthur Gordon has not been called upon for any explanations, but did address a despatch to Lord Granville observing upon the remarks made by counsel in the case of "Bryce v. Rusden." It was written for the information of the Secretary of State only, and Lord Granville decided that it should not be published. I see no reason for re-opening the matter.

Colonel Hughes-Hallett

BURMAH—GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT—SEC. 27.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the special powers under which the Secretary of State for India ordered the annexation of Burmah without consulting his Council were those given by section 26, or those given by section 27, of the Government of India Act; and, if he acted under section 26, whether the reasons which he was bound to record for so doing would be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir John Gorst) (Chatham): The powers referred to in the Question are those given by Section 27 of the Government of India Act.

METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD— ACCOMMODATION FOR IMBECILE CHILDREN.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the fact that the accommodation provided for imbecile children by the Metropolitan Asylums Board is insufficient for the needs of the metropolis; and, whether the Board has an unoccupied asylum at Hampstead; and, if so, whether this asylum might not be utilised for the reception of imbecile children?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is the fact that the accommodation provided for imbecile children by the Metropolitan Asylums Board is at present insufficient for the needs of the Metropolis. But the Managers are now extending the schools for imbecile children at Darenth. I understand that the buildings will be completed this summer, and it is expected that, when finished, they will afford the accommodation required for children of this class. The Managers have an asylum at Hampstead which is not at this moment occupied; but in the event of any serious increase of fever in the Metropolis it would, no doubt, be necessary to use that asylum for fever patients.

METROPOLITAN POOR AMENDMENT ACT, 1870—RATIONS OF POOR LAW OFFICERS.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, What is the scale fixed by the Board for the cost of the rations of Poor Law officers, chargeable on the Common Poor Fund under the second section of "The Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act, 1870," and what proportion the cost of such rations according to this scale bears to their actual average cost throughout the Metropolis; and, whether he is of opinion that the poorer unions of London receive under this scale the full relief contemplated by the Legislature in passing the Act of 1870?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The scale fixed by the Board for repayment from the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund in respect of the rations of officers is—for masters, matrons, medical officers, when resident, schoolmasters, and schoolmistresses, 12s. per week each; for other officers, assistants, and servants, 7s. per week each. The Poor Law Board, when they fixed this scale in 1870, stated that they were aware that the actual character and cost of the rations allowed differed materially in different workhouses, and they had taken an average sum as fairly approximating the cost. There is no ground for supposing that the cost has increased since that time.

—THE SPECIAL MILITARY OFFICER
IN COMMAND.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any, and, if any, what special instructions have been given to the special Military Officer of high rank appointed to the command of the disturbed districts of Kerry and Clare, with a view to the prevention and detection of crime; whether, if no such special instructions have been given, he will act upon his own discretion, either as to the trial of prisoners, or the calling out of the Military; whether he will be permitted to summon whomever he pleases, and privately cross-examine such persons; whether he will have power to try by himself, or order the trial of, such or any other parties, either summarily or by court martial, and to convict them upon such evidence as may have been obtained by private cross-examination; whether he will have power to order the arrest of supposed offenders on suspicion, and without the sworn information of witnesses; whether the trial of persons so arrested will be conducted privately; and, if so, under what branch or rule of the Common or Statute Law; whether the Reports and communications he is to make to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant will be laid before Parliament; and, what special training he has received in the prevention and detection of crime, or the exercise of the functions of a civil magistrate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Holmes) (Dublin University): As this matter concerns the Irish Government, I have been asked by my noble Friend to reply; and I have to say, in answer to the several clauses of this Question, that the Government consider that they have given to the House full and complete information as to the position which will be occupied and the authority which will be exercised by Sir Redvers Buller, and the Government have nothing to add to what has been already stated on these subjects.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether Sir Redvers Buller, as is customary with all magnates sent down to this county, will take up his headquarters at the County Club, Tralee, and take his information from the local landlords?

[No reply.]

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, whether he would be kind enough to answer the last part of the Question, as it will be in the recollection of the House that it has not any information upon it?

[No reply.]

LEGISLATION.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of bringing in a Bill next Session to make the payment of tithes by landlords compulsory?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. Matthews) (Birmingham, E.), in reply, said, that it would be for the Govern-

—TRAWLING.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the result of the inquiry into the effects of trawling, which was held by the Fishery Commissioners under the Presidency of Sir Thomas Brady, is yet known; and, if the exemption from trawling now enjoyed by the Firth of Forth will be extended wholly or partially to Galway Bay?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The Inspectors of Fisheries report that they have not yet arrived at a decision with reference to the trawling at Galway pending the result of inquiries now being held into the subject generally in regard to other parts of Ireland. The Inspectors add, however, that in the course of their inquiry at Galway they received no evidence which would, in their opinion, justify the adoption there of such a bye-law as that which is in force with reference to the Firth of Forth.

RETURN.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, North-West) asked, Whether the Government had any information to communicate to the House with reference to the return of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The last news received by the Secretary of State about the return of Prince Alexander is that he arrived yesterday at Rustchuk, where he was received with great enthusiasm by the population. We do not know the route by which he has since proceeded.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE
MENT ORDERS—MOTIONS ON PERPETUAL PENSIONS AND INCI-DENCE OF THE POOR RATE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, the Motion for which he had obtained the first place for September 7 being purely a matter of finance, and one which had excited a good deal of interest outside, the Government would permit him to go on with it on that day? In the event of the noble Lord not being in a position to accede to that request, he would venture most earnestly to appeal to him, as the question had not been delayed by any action on his part, as he had pressed it on the attention of the House for some time, and as 30 pensions had been commuted since the matter was first raised, whether the Government would undertake that no further commutation should take place until Parliament had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject?

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said, that he had on the Paper to-morrow a Motion drawing attention to the gross inequality of the existing poor rate; and he wished to know whether the noble Lord proposed that the Government Orders should take precedence of the Notices of Motion to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): In reply to the hon. Member who asked the last Question, I should imagine I should be only consulting the general convenience of the House in asking the House to give precedence to Government Orders for to-morrow. I hardly think the hon. Member would himself be of opinion that he could usefully this Session, and at this period of the year, draw attention to the very important subject of which he has given Notice, and therefore it would be my intention to ask the House to agree to the same Resolutions which they adopted last Tuesday. In reply to the hon. Member for Northampton, it would be obvious to him that, even if he brought on his Motion to-morrow and obtained the Committee, that Committee could not possibly proceed to work this Session; and, therefore, the Government would not be inclined to make any exception in the case of the Motion of the hon. Member. But I may add this—that the Government are quite sensible of the importance of the subject with which he has been so long connected, and they are equally sensible of the fact that a great deal of public attention has, by his efforts, been directed to the question of perpetual pensions; and they will be perfectly prepared next Session, if the hon. Member should persevere with this Motion, to grant the Committee for which he asks. I would only say, in view of the statement he made, that a great number of pensions had been commuted since 1881, that I would beg him to bear in mind that neither this Government nor the Conservative Government in Office from June last year to January this year are responsible for the commutation of any one of these pensions. In the meantime, and until the hon. Member brings on his Motion next Session, which I hope he will do early, no further pensions will be commuted.

DISTURBANCES AT BELFAST INQUIRY BILL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W., and Sligo, S. asked, Whether the Attorney General for Ireland proposed to take the second reading of the Disturbances at Belfast Inquiry Bill to-night? If so, at what hour?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) said, he would proceed with the Bill if it was reached at a reasonable time. Of course, that would depend on the course of the debate.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be good enough to indicate what he thinks reasonable time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) (Paddington, S.): The hon. Member must be aware that there is a Notice of opposition to the Bill; therefore it cannot come on after half-past 12. If, as I hope, the debate on the Address should conclude to-night at a reasonable hour, then my right hon. and learned Friend will proceed with the Bill.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [19th August]. —[See page 96.]

Question again proposed.

BURMAH (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—INCIDENCE OF COST.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I rise to move the Amendment to the Address which stands in my name. I must apologize for raising anew a question that was disposed of in the last Parliament; but circumstances have altered considerably since then. The war in Upper Burmah, instead of being a military promenade, costing £300,000, has developed into a national uprising, involving much bloodshed and expenditure. Our forces are to be raised to nearly 30,000 men this coming winter, and no one can tell how long it will take to trample out the resistance of an entire nation. It seems certain that, instead of costing £300,000, it is likely to cost several millions; and I wish this House to consider afresh whether it is fair to throw upon the overburdened Exchequer of India so heavy an additional burden. Then we have further information, since last January, of the increased embarrassment of the finances of India, owing to the heavy fall of silver and exchange; the last Budget presented in June showed a deficit for last year of £2,800,000, and the coming year only showed an equilibrium by taking the exchange at 1s. 6d.; but exchange has fallen since then to 1s. 4½d. at ½d., which will cause a deficit of £1,500,000; and if we add to this probably £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 for the expenses of the war in Burmah, the Indian Exchequer will show the alarming deficit of £4,000,000 next year. These facts were not known, or very imperfectly known, last January or February; and I trust that the new House of Commons will look into these matters fairly and fully, and resolve to relieve India, in whole or in part, of a war which was entered upon contrary to the wishes of her people, and in the supposed interests of England, not of India. My Amendment expresses regret at the continuance and extension of the war; but I might have gone further, and condemned the policy that has led to it. It is true that King Theebaw was a bad Ruler, and that he gave considerable cause of offence to the Government of Lower Burmah, and a plausible excuse might be given for temporary intervention; but I hold that no excuse can be given for annexation. It has violated the deep national convictions of the Burmese, and has led to a war which places us in the most odious light. We have been the cause of the destruction of the capital, Mandalay, and have carried fire and sword all over the country. The prisoners that fall into our hands under the name of dacoits are executed. These men are simply carrying on a guerilla warfare in the manner customary to their country, and we are resorting to measures to crush them that will make us detested by the whole population. We are just doing in Upper Burmah what we condemned the French for doing in Tonquin and Madagascar, and are acting the part of Pharisees when we say we are going there to civilize the people and develop the country. We have caused more misery and loss of life in the last six months than Theebaw did in the six years of his reign, and no end of it can yet be seen. I trust that even yet it is not too late to retire from our false position, just as we have had to do in the Transvaal and Afghanistan. It would be a humiliating thing to do, but better than to lay waste the country with years of internecine warfare. But the main point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is the unfairness of charging the whole cost of the war to India. It was made in defiance of the unanimous Native opinion of India. I can testify, from my observations made when travelling through the country soon after the annexation was proclaimed, that not a Native voice was raised in favour of it; it was universally regarded as purely a British affair, in which India had no interest; the Indian people believed it was made in the interests of British trade, and I think they were not far wrong. Those addresses from the Chambers of Commerce reveal the cloven foot pretty clearly. Let me read to the House the Resolution passed at the National Indian Congress held last year—

"That this Congress deprecates the annexation of Upper Burmah, and considers that if the Government unfortunately decide on annexation, the entire country of Burmah should be separated from the Indian Viceroyalty, and constituted a Crown Colony, as distinct in all matters from the Government of this country as is Ceylon."

This Congress was truly representative of the best Native opinion in India; it consisted of the ablest Natives from all parts of India; many of the number were highly cultivated gentlemen, and its opinion ought to have weight with the Government of this country. The Burmese are, in all respects, distinct from the people of India; ethnologically, they are a different race; they are of a different religion, being Buddhists, and have far more affinity with the Chinese than with the Hindoos. It seems to me a mere pretext to say that such a war was necessary for the safety of India; but it may be said that India derives a large surplus revenue from Lower Burmah. I suppose it remits a sum of somewhere between £500,000 and £1,000,000 to the Indian Treasury; but the war by which we acquired Lower Burmah cost, I understand, £15,000,000 sterling, so that this so-called surplus revenue only defrays the charge of the Debt it imposed on India. I would be fairly satisfied, however, if the House decided to limit the charge on India to the surplus revenue from Lower Burmah, and place the remainder on England. I have dealt so far mainly with the question of justice; but I wish also to appeal to the sentiment of mercy. India is a desperately poor country; it is far below the poverty of any country that we hear of in Europe. I must say to the House that I was startled at the results of my inquiries as to the social condition of the people. I am sure, if the House and the people of this country realized the condition of the masses of the Indian people, they would not permit heavy burdens to be thrown upon them with the haste which is too often done. I hope the House will allow me to read a short extract from the Budget speech of Sir Evelyn Baring, when Finance Minister of India, 18th March, 1882—

"It has been calculated that the average income per head of population in India is not more than 27 rupees a-year; and, though I am not prepared to pledge myself to the absolute accuracy of a calculation of this sort, it is sufficiently accurate to justify the conclusion that the taxpaying community is exceedingly poor. To derive any very large increase of revenue from so poor a population as this is obviously impossible, and, if it were possible, would be unjustifiable."

Again, in the discussion on the same Budget, he said, after repeating the above statement of 27 rupees per head per annum—

"... But he thought it was quite sufficient to show the extreme poverty of the mass of the people. In England the average income per head of population was £33 per head; in France it was £23; in Turkey, which was the poorest country in Europe, it was £4 per head. He would ask hon. Members to think what 21 rupees per annum was to support a person, and then he would ask whether a few annas was nothing to such a poor people?"

Mr. Samuel Smith

I am bound to say that most of the good authorities I met with in India considered Sir Evelyn Baring's estimate as too high; and, certainly, I should not put the average income at over £2 per head, which would give £400,000,000 for British India; whereas the best statisticians put the aggregate income of the United Kingdom at £1,250,000,000 reckoned in the same manner. But let us take another test—the income tax. It is levied on all incomes of £50 per annum and above; whereas, in England, it begins at £150; but there are some large classes of exemptions in India, so that, on the whole, a fair comparison can be made as to taxpaying power. Now, 1*d.* in the income tax here realizes about £2,000,000—in India, a little over £200,000; so that, speaking roughly, the ability of India to pay income tax is only 1-10th what it is in this country, though the population is six times as large. That is, on a given area of population in India there is only 1-60th part of the taxable wealth there is in this country. I may add that only one person in 700 is liable to income tax—that is, has an income of £50 per annum—allowing for the limited class of exemptions already referred to. As another proof of the poverty of India, I may add that the best authorities have calculated that 50,000,000 of the population only eat one meal a day, and that of the coarsest food. In years of scarcity vast masses of the population are on the verge of famine, and would die of starvation unless fed by the Government; and, in spite of a very large expenditure on relief works, it is computed that 10,000,000 of people died of famine in the decade ending 1880. India is a country almost entirely of poor peasantry, the bulk of whom are hopelessly in debt to the money-lenders. I was assured that as many as 9-10ths of the ryots were in debt; but authorities like Sir James Caird put the number at 3-4ths; and so small are their holdings that in Bengal, out of 10,000,000 of holdings, it is computed that 6,000,000 do not pay a rent of more than 5 rupees each. Compare that with Ireland, where it is considered a proof of extreme poverty that 100,000 or 150,000 holdings are under £5 each. The fact is, the mass of the Indian peasantry are below the level of the peasantry of Connaught. It is impossible to screw more taxes out of the people without oppressing or demoralizing them. You cannot add to the income tax, which is hated in India on account of its inquisitorial character, and the great amount of black-mail which it leads to among the subordinate officials. It would be cruel to add to the salt tax, which is enormously high already, and is a first necessity of life in India. The Government is already demoralizing the people, by forcing on them liquor shops for the sake of revenue; are they to be forced still further in this direction? You cannot screw more revenue out of India, unless you reimpose Customs duties—the only tax which India would willingly pay, but which British selfishness forbids. I protest against any further burdens being placed on the poor, afflicted people of India. I do not believe that the British democracy would willingly be a party to such cruelty. If you relieve India of the cost of the Burmese War, she will still have a deficit in the coming year of £1,000,000 or £2,000,000, owing to the further fall of silver and exchange. Her financiers are at their wits' end with this tremendous difficulty; they are appealing to the Home Government to help them in their difficulties, and, so far, they have appealed in vain; but I am glad to think that the present Administration is prepared to help them so far as to grant a Royal Commission of Inquiry on the subject. I will not enlarge on this, as it would take me outside the limits of my Amendment; but before sitting down I would call the attention of the House to the rapid growth of an educated Native opinion in India, which judges us by the same political standards we ourselves apply. Nothing struck me more in India, than the rapid growth of political intelligence. We cannot afford to treat India any longer as a nation of children. The debates in this House are carefully perused by thousands of the Natives; the principles of the "Mid Lothian speeches" are applied to themselves; and I am sorry to have to say that the general judgment of India is that we do not hold the scales fairly. They resent the charge to India of any of the cost of the wars in Egypt or Abyssinia. They were indignant at the waste of their resources in Afghanistan; and if several millions are added to their Debt on account of Upper Burmah, their loyalty to this country will be severely strained. The universal complaint in India is the excessive costliness of our Government. The expenditure has grown enormously of late years; it is entirely outstepping the resources of the country. The Budget of £75,000,000 last year would have made old Indian Administrators, like Lord Lawrence, stand aghast; but next year it will be nearly £80,000,000 if the cost of this unjust Burmese War be thrown upon India. I ask you to agree to this Amendment on the broad ground of justice, because this is rather a British than an Indian war. I ask you to do so on the ground of mercy, because India is a very poor and heavily-taxed country; and, lastly, on the ground of policy, because it will strengthen loyalty among our Indian subjects, and show them that, though not represented here, the British Parliament will not spurn their mute appeal.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.), in rising to second the Motion, said, he thought it could be justified on Constitutional grounds. Since the discussion on this subject in February last the war in Burmah had developed to a degree which was not anticipated then; and results had arisen, which were not foreseen at the time, which must be very long continued in their action. They were justified, he thought, on the ground of Parliamentary precedent, in bringing forward this Motion, and getting a final decision as to who should pay the expenses of the war. Resolutions similar to that passed in February had been passed without prejudice in relation to the Egyptian and Afghan Wars, in respect of which contributions were afterwards made by England to the Indian Exchequer. The Motion was justified on another ground—that the House had not yet been put in possession of Lord Dufferin's views as to what he considered the best treatment of the Burmese Question. So far as he was aware, they had no justification from those in responsible positions in India for the annexation of Upper Burmah. Nay, further, it was clear that the annexation was carried out by the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) without consulting the Indian Council. That was only made known to the House on February 25 last, and confirmed by the Under Secretary to-night. He did not say the noble Lord, in so acting, was doing an unconstitutional thing; but that fact was not in possession of the House during the discussion in January or February last. He hoped the House would consider the information which it had on this subject. In February last they had very little information, and now they had little more. Beyond the despatch of December 31, with which the Blue Book concluded, very little further information had been vouchsafed to the House; and the final and definite proposals which were then promised, and on which the policy of annexation was based—a policy which the Liberal Government accepted—had not yet been laid upon the Table of the House. They had not only no information in regard to the conduct of affairs in Burmah; they had no justification of those responsible in India for the annexation and the great development which had taken place in the war. There was a great deal more information one would like to hear in connection with the conduct of the war, and the administration of the country since last February; for it was impossible—although one did not like to impute blame in the absence of information—to come to any other conclusion than that there had been in some quarters very grave miscarriage and bungling to bring about the existing state of affairs in that country. The decision which the House came to in February last with reference to the expenses of the Expedition should not bind it irrevocably under the altered circumstances of the case. In February it was thought the annexation of Burmah would be little more than a great triumphal march; but all that had been changed, and they were in November next to have over 30,000 troops in Burmah. There had been no fresh or definite information supplied to the House on the question of the expenses of the annexation. The future expenditure was put down in March in Sir Auckland Colvin's Financial Statement at 30 lacs of rupees, and the Under Secretary a few nights ago gave them no further information; but, seeing that the warlike forces in Burmah had increased fivefold since then, the estimate was absolutely valueless, and the figures given could not be accepted as giving a full and complete account of what the expenditure might be. He did not like to prophesy what the expense would be; but it would be very heavy. He was afraid the House and the country must now abandon all those rose-coloured pictures about the people of Upper Burmah desiring the establishment of British rule in that country. We might call the opposition that of dacoits and robbers; but we were really face to face with a national resistance of the population of Upper Burmah. That general resistance did not take place till the annexation was finally decided upon. The people were quite ready to get rid of Theebaw; but they wanted to see established some kind of Native Government, perhaps under British control. Another important point was our relations with China in consequence of the annexation, on which the House ought to have more information. A great point had been made in connection with the annexation as to the extension of British trade that would result, especially with China. So far as he could make out, the terms of the Treaty, announced by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs the other night, practically gave China everything she wanted, and the prospect of opening up a profitable trade between India and China rid Burmah was not very greatly facilitated by the course that had been taken. There was to be a Boundary Commission and a Frontier Trade Commission, and anything or everything might be ceded under either Commission. If they were going to throw all the expense of these operations on the Indian Exchequer they ought to be able to show a stronger case as to this being an exclusively Indian war. The closest precedents were the Persian War of 1856 and the Afghan War. The Afghan War, for example, was undertaken to remedy what was believed to be a state of insecurity on the frontier, and it was originally proposed and resolved to throw the whole expense of the Expedition on the Indian Exchequer. The question was subsequently reconsidered, and the ultimate conclusion arrived at was that the Home Government agreed to pay £5,000,000, or about one-fourth out of £20,000,000, which was the cost of the war. It was contended in favour of that course that unless the war could be shown to be an exclusively Indian war the expense ought not to be put exclusively on the Indian Exchequer. In this case he did not think that the House was prepared to admit that the Burmese War was in any sense exclusively an Indian war, and one in which Imperial interests had no part. The hon. Gentleman concluded by seconding the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words,—“And this House humbly expresses its regret at the continuance of the War in Upper Burmah, and the great extension of Military operations occasioned thereby; and humbly represents to Her Majesty that the expenses of the said War should not be borne exclusively by India.”—(Mr. Samuel Smith.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston). in rising to move, as an Amendment to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. Samuel Smith) to the Address, to leave out all the words after “Burmah, and” to the end of the proposed Amendment, in order to add the words—

“At learning that the Government have resolved to persevere in their policy of annexation, especially as the Native population have, by their active hostility and armed resistance to the invading force, shown that they have no desire to live under British rule,” said, he desired to refer at the outset to the attempts which had been made on his own side of the House to frame an Amendment to the Address regarding this question which should clearly embody their opinions, and which should prevent complications arising when the division was announced. These attempts had not been successful; and it was because the Amendment of the hon. Member Mr. Samuel Smith) did not raise the question into the higher regions to which he thought it ought to be raised, and did not condemn the character of the war, nor express an opinion as to whether it was righteous or not in its commencement and in its continuance, that he felt compelled to bring forward his Amendment. He regretted that it had been said in a Liberal organ that whether the war was just or unjust, now we were in for it we must, for the honour of the country, fight it out. In the last Parliament he listened attentively to the debates dealing with the question of Burmah in the hope that he would learn the real reasons for the war, but in vain. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Exchequer approached the consideration of the question on that occasion with a light heart, and openly exulted in the part that he had played in connection with promoting that war. He said that he was proud in belonging to a Government that had added to the Dominions of the Crown and the enterprise of British commerce, and to civilization and progress, so vast and valuable a possession. It seemed to him (Mr. Cremer), however, that the noble Lord on that occasion was premature in announcing that Upper Burmah as a valuable possession had been added to the Dominions of the Crown. He (Mr. Cremer) contended that no valid reason was given at the time for the war in Burmah. The real cause of the war was given by the then Secretary of State for India, who said that the Viceroy thought that the war must be undertaken for the safety and protection of British Burmah and of Her Majesty's Dominions in other parts of the world; and he estimated that the cost of the Expedition would probably not exceed £300,000. It was also alleged that it was necessary, for the protection and safety of British Burmah, to depose King Theebaw; but the feeble resistance of Theebaw proved that the fears entertained by the Government as to the dangers to be apprehended from that Monarch were absolutely groundless. If the real object of the war had been to depose this wicked Monarch, King Theebaw, as they had been told, why should they not have set up another in his place? Lord Harris said that there were no less than 70 surviving Members of the Royal Family to choose from, and surely some one of the number might have been found to occupy the Throne of King Theebaw. It was quite clear such was not the intention of the Government neither in the first nor in the last instance, and that they had other objects in view. He had often observed that for months before a warlike expedition was set on foot the Press were very busy circulating reports with regard to the mischief going on from the action of somebody somewhere, and so paving the way for an Ultimatum or Expedition. In the same way, for several months before action was taken by the Government, the Press of this country were continually telling the world that King Theebaw was a wicked Monarch, and constantly breaking his word. Why, they had Monarchs nearer home who had been guilty of offences of that kind. Recently there was a question of the violation by a Monarch of a Treaty or obligation which he was said to have come under with this and other countries; but there had been no words about an Ultimatum or Expedition to chastise the Ruler in question or depose him from his Throne. We reserved our wrath, indignation, and chastisement for weak rather than strong Monarchs. Then it was said that King Theebaw had been very cruel to his subjects. Some could recollect the horrors perpetrated by Napoleon III. on December 2 upon his subjects; but we caressed him as our good and faithful ally. As in the case of Egypt, so with regard to Burmah, one of the reasons given out for the Expedition was that the French would have gone there if we had not. All he (Mr. Cremer) could say was that if we made the same muddle and created the same disturbances in Burmah as the result of our interference as we had effected in Egypt, it would have been much better that we should have left King Theebaw and his subjects to settle their relations and differences by themselves, and without our interference; and it was an unfortunate thing, both for Burmah and for the British people, that we had gone there. We had now 30,000 soldiers and police in Upper Burmah, and reinforcements were on their way; and yet it was said that our hold upon that country was not increasing; but anarchy and confusion were increasing in British Burmah; and we held our position in Mandalay with difficulty. Unhappily, the remarkable letters of the Rangoon Correspondent of The Times showed that we were in a fair way of already producing similar disastrous results. He wanted to know who were the wire-pullers who brought about all these little wars? He entirely repudiated the doctrine that this country was justified in invading and annexing other countries for the sake of extending British commerce or extending the Dominions of the Crown. He believed that the Government, Parliament, and the nation had been deceived by the Indian officials with reference to the real condition of affairs in Upper Burmah, and that the people of that country had shown by their protracted resistance that they had no desire for British rule. He had brought forward his Amendment because he believed that by our conduct there we had violated the Proclamation in which was solemnly stated that Her Majesty's Government did not desire any further extension of Her Majesty's Dominions in India. The people of Upper Burmah were now only doing that which we had been taught was the sacred duty of all good citizens—namely, to repel by every means in their power the invaders of their country. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out all the words after the words "Burmah, and" to the end of the proposed Amendment, in order to add the words "at learning that the Government have resolved to persevere in their policy of annexation, especially as the Native population have, by their active hostility and armed resistance to the invading forces, shown that they have no desire to live under British rule,"—(Mr. Cremer,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) said, he understood the hon. Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) to complain that the House was obliged to discuss this difficult question without the Papers being before it. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross), the moment he took Office, did his utmost to provide the House with adequate information on the subject. He (Sir John Gorst) desired to express his regret that the Blue Book, containing all information with regard to Burmah—and which had been promised by the noble Viscount—was not yet in the hands of hon. Members. It was prepared, and was now in the hands of the printer, and he expected every day it would be distributed to hon. Members. It appeared to him that the Amendments which had been moved raised considerations for the House of Commons upon three points—First, whether the Government was to blame for the prolongation of the war in Upper Burmah, for, of course, every hon. Member in that House must feel regret for that prolongation; secondly, whether the expenses of that war should be borne exclusively by the Revenues of India; and, thirdly, whether Her Majesty's Government should persevere in the attempt to make Upper Burmah a part of the British Dominions, or whether they ought to hand back the country to some Native Potentate under some conditions not specified in the Amendment which had just been moved? Upon these three points he would endeavour to give the House the most frank and ample information. In the course of the speeches which had been delivered that evening reference had been made to one point which was quite outside the scope of the Amendments, and that was with reference to the negotiations that had recently taken place with regard to Upper Burmah between the Government of India and that of the Empire of China. On this point it would be sufficient for him to repeat the language of his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson), to the effect that a Convention satisfactory to all parties had been arrived at between the two Governments, and which gave great advantages to this country. He might further say upon this point that the action of the Chinese Government throughout the negotiations which had resulted in this Convention being agreed upon had been of the most friendly character. If hon. Members were dissatisfied with the course which had been pursued in this matter they ought to have brought it before the House in the shape of a definite Motion, and not in the form of an Amendment to the Address. He did not think that by either of the Amendments which had been moved the question of the justice of the original invasion of Upper Burmah had been distinctly raised, although undoubtedly the hon. Member for Shore-ditch (Mr. Cremer) had in the course of his speech asserted that that war was unnecessary and unrighteous in its inception. If hon. Members held such an opinion it was their duty to have challenged the policy and the justice of the war by some direct Motion; and if they declined to take that course they ought to refrain from making statements which were derogatory to the honour and the humanity of this country. The question of the justice and necessity of the original war in Upper Burmah was not in any sense a Party one. The initiative in the matter was due to Lord Dufferin as Governor General of India, and the proposal for the invasion of Upper Burmah was only made after long years of resistance of the idea on the part of the Indian Government. The opinion of Lord Dufferin having been communicated to the noble Lord the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill), when Secretary of State for India, he and his Colleagues gave the policy proposed by Lord Dufferin their full sanction. Subsequently it became the duty of the late Government to review the action of Lord Dufferin and of their Predecessors in making this war, and they came to the conclusion that the war was not a trade war in any sense, but had been undertaken for the protection and safety of British Burmah and of our Indian Dominions in general. In the debate on the 22nd February the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) said—
